42nd annual report on U.S. agencies

U.S. agency profiles are arranged alphabetically within two segments: The top 100 accounting for 84% of the composite gross income of the Ad Age 500 agencies, and the remaining agencies reporting. Profiles are carried on more than 500 agencies, but only data from the top 500 agencies—listed on the tables on Pages 8-16—is pulled for the various charts that show year-to-year comparisons in this report.

This Ted Bates Co. subsidiary suffered a slight decline on the gross income side because of the departure of Puerto Rico Tourist Office when there was a change in government there. The company, out "beating the bushes for new business," grabbed Beefeaters, its first venture into the liquor business, and is seeking to build a diversified business in hi-tech, fashion and shoes. Agency totals include that of a five-person office in Athens, Greece.

The $10 million in new business added at Admarketing giving it a 6.2% increase in billings was split between internal growth and new business. The agency's new clients—Circuit City Stores, Cousins Home Furnishings and Standard Shoes—are expected to increase advertising spending 17% in 1986, adding $34 million in billings. This should soften the loss of $6.5 million in annualized billings in 1985 when the Southern California Oldsmobile dealers and Kentucky Fried Chicken franchise group left the agency.

Annual review

Publicly-held Ally & Gargano recorded an 11% increase in billings and set a record in earnings per share. But the agency got off to a wobbly start in 1986, first because it lost the Polaroid Corp. account (at the end of 1985), Sun Banks, and then MCI's consumer account. The latter, lost to DMB&B, which handles MCI's business-to-business account—an area MCI is emphasizing—particularly stunned the agency, which had won numerous awards for its creative. An agency spokesman expects ongoing accounts alone to keep the agency above $125 million in total billings in 1986.

Reader's guide to agency interpretation

Acme Group, headquartered in New York, answered a questionnaire sent to the agency by Ad Age in late December. If ... editors had not heard from Acme by the questionnaire filing deadline in late January, they sent a second mailing to the agency. If there was still no response and Acme Group had gross income of $5 million or more, the agency was telephoned for a response.

The ☑ in the boxtop is explained on Page 8.

Media breakdown defines where an agency spends clients' monies. The breakdown figures are percentages of the total U.S. capitalized volume per medium. The breakdown adds up to 100%. This year Ad Age is seeking to get a clear reading on the use of direct response advertising, which totaled 8% of total media expenditures in 1985 as monitored for the Ad Age 500 in this issue.

Most office billings breakouts were supplied on the questionnaire by agencies. Where they did not respond, agencies were asked to confirm Ad Age estimates based on published reports on individual markets and other criteria. For the most part, those who did not cooperate in the questionnaire responded to the estimates.

Financial data are collected for gross income and billings and are in millions of dollars.

• Gross income: Agencies are ranked by gross income, which gives a better indication of an agency's size than billings. Gross income is the traditional agency (meaning the agency receives most of its income from media commission) is the sum of three sources: The 15% an agency makes from buying media; a 17.65% markup for materials and services billed the client, and the fee charged the client—a form of remuneration popular with clients whose media market is low-cost in comparison with more costly media like tv or consumer magazines.

• Billings: Billings is short for "capitalized billings" and represents the sum of three types of agency activity: Total commissionable billings for ad space and time; gross billings to clients for materials like artwork, research and so on for services when supplied or performed by organizations other than the agency, and capitalized fees. Fees are capitalized by multiplying fees by 6.67. This makes an equivalent of fee income and commissions from media billings. For example, if commissions from media are 15%, then commissions multiplied by 6.67 would be the total media placed (6.67 is the quotient of 100 divided by 15). For non-U.S. shops in parent worldwide financial totals, Ad Age seeks figures representing only the parent agency equity in the shop.

Ad Age based annual reviews on staff interviews with top executives at the agency.

Griswold Inc., Cleveland, shortened from Griswold-Eshleman Co. in 1983, and merged the end of 1985 into Ross Roy Inc., Detroit, once had a Chicago connection—Aubrey, Finlay, Marley & Hodgson. Griswold bought the shop in 1963. It handled business for International Harvester before Griswold shut the agency down in 1978.

The loss of the $40 million-plus Seven-Up account largely affected a 0.1% decline in domestic billings. Ayer added the coveted AT&T Consumer Products account with billings of about $40 million to its other AT&T business. A push to expand the size of foreign shops and build the international network paid off as non-U.S. billings rose 97.3%, influencing a 11.5% increase in over-all billings at Ayer. Stateside, it is seeking specialty communications acquisitions.

Loss of Red Lobster and Miller's Lowenbrau had the most impact on billings, down 2.7% or $10.7 million, says the agency, which expects activity to pick up in 1986 as billings materialize from new clients, Fisher-Price ($15 million) gained in December, Hyundai dealers ($30 million) for the Korean car won in September, and Arby's and Miller draft beer ($20 million each). The agency bought AdCom, the Quaker Oats agency in Chicago, and opened a Los Angeles office.

Annual review

A 9.2% growth in U.S. billings at Ted Bates amounting to a net increase of $162 million came 75% from existing clients and 25% from new business. Avis Rent A Car worth $14 million in business, Commodore International worth estimates of $80 million ($20 million-plus for the Amiga rollout in 1985), and $21 million from Mars, $25 million from Warner-Lambert, and $18 million from Panasonic more than offset the loss of R.J. Reynold's Sterling cigarets.

New gains in 1986 include Prudential-Bache worth $12 million in billings, and Carter-Wallace's Trojan condoms. Bates is involved in "encouraging talks" to purchase a leading Hispanic agency, Conill Advertising, New York, and was to reach an agreement by the end of this month to purchase Kobs & Brady, a Chicago-based direct marketing agency. On the personnel side, at year-end it hired former JWT/Chicago exec vp-exec creative director, Ralph Rydholm, for the creative spot left vacant when it let go vice-chairman/chief creative officer Michael Becker after he requested broader worldwide influence coupled with reduced responsibilities at Ted Bates/New York. McDonald & Little, its Atlanta unit, was closed in the fall, and Bates has no plans to return to that city at present.

Annual review

Despite a 0.9% drop in non-U.S. billings, over-all billings grew by 10.6%, an increase credited to larger budgets from big advertisers stateside which helped push up U.S. billings by 15.6%. The decline in overseas billings was due in part to the disinvestment of South African operations, which were sold back to the partners. U.S. strength came in part from new accounts, Visa, Lorillard (Kents) and Polaroid. The full effect of their billings contribution will be felt in 1986, although so will the loss in 1986 of Black & Decker. Net income at publicly-held BBDO was down 13.3% to $19.6 million on revenues of $335.6 million, up 9.9% for the year. However, fourth quarter net income increased 20% on a 21.2% increase in revenues.

This February there was a two-for-one stock split and increased dividend. BBDO expects growth of 8%-10% in 1986.

Increased business from the beverage but non-beer side of Anheuser-Busch helped push billings up 19.7%, although gross income grew only 2.4% reflecting the March, 1985, sale of Bloom Business Agency in Houston to its management, the August, 1984, sale of Automated Production, a typesetting operation in Dallas, and the May, 1985, closing of SRB Advertising in Dallas and the merging of its clients into the main Bloom agency there.

Bozell & Jacobs, bought in 1985 by Lorimar Inc., and folded into Lorimar-owned Kenyon & Eckhardt on Jan. 2, 1986, together with K&E had increased billings of 16.5% worldwide (17.6% U.S.), an increase of $173 million ($165 million U.S.). New clients gained by the combo, Nabisco's Planters peanuts, Tyco Toys, Texas Instruments and Faberge, will account for $181 million in new billings. The agency had $90 million in internal growth from American Airlines, Minnesota Business Equipment, American Stores and Mutual of Omaha. Seagrams and Armour frozen foods, the major losses, walked out with their combined $30 million in billings. Only Houston, of the agency's regional shops, suffered a loss. Its 7.7% decline was traced to clients in the depressed oil business. The agency is looking for a 15%-20% growth increase for 1986. Agency parent, Lorimar, a publicly held producer of tv programing, was bought in October, 1985, by Telepictures.

Annual review

This J. Walter Thompson Co. subsidiary, which registered a 19.9% growth in billings, expects a leveling off to 9%-10% in 1986. That increase will come largely from new business, because current clients—10 of which were gained in 1985—are holding steady or slightly increasing their budgets. Brouillard is a specialty shop in corporate and financial services, business-to-business and association advertising and pr.

Using current clients as the base, EPB expects 1986 capitalized volume to hit $120 million, an increase of 16%. The agency, however, gained potentially $45 million in new business in 1985, much of this to be realized in 1986. The agency purchased the Richmond office of Interpublic's Campbell-Ewald Co. in January, 1986. EPB is primarily a fee and time-based agency, with many of its clients paying their own media. About 30%-40% of its business is in pr, sales promotion and direct marketing.

Annual review

Leo Burnett Co.'s healthy 12% increase in domestic billings offset the resignation of the Nestle overseas account and unfavorable dollar translations. Overseas billings accounted for 32% of Burnett's total billings but were down 0.2% for the year. Growth in 1986 is expected from existing accounts like Pillsbury (Totino's and Jeno's) and United because of its expansion into Asia-Pacific routes formerly run by PanAm, and new account, Seven-Up (worth $40 million-plus) gained in 1985.

Leo Burnett celebrated its Golden Anniversary and began construction of its new headquarters in the Chicago North Loop.

Miller Beer Plank Road and Pizza Hut were the locomotives behind the agency's 30% increase in billings, and a full year of spending from these clients should pay off for the agency in 1986.

In 1986, Chiat/Day has lost its recent $3 million Neutrogena (soap) acquisition, and the $50 million Apple Computer account is under review as the client reassesses its U.S. marketing program, seeking strategy proposals from both Chiat and BBDO. C&W Group, an amalgam of four agencies headed by Cunningham & Walsh, New York, suffered a drop in billings of 8.1% reflecting the loss in 1984 of Brown & Williamson and year-end departure of Mitsubishi. C&W is seeking to grab another auto account and to acquire a healthcare agency. Existing clients—P&G, American Home Products and Beecham—are expected to have strong years in 1986. DFS gained nearly $50 million in billings from Masters Brewing, Donnelly Directories and Information Publishing, Stauffer Chemical, Pioneer Electronic and Pacific Northwest Bell, which accounted for almost half of its 16% increase in worldwide billings. Dorland Advertising in February, 1986, in effect bought DFS when it lent $75 million to DFS Holdings officers —Stuart B. Upson, chairman-ceo, Peter F. McSpadden, president, William McC. Vickery and Robert E. Kennedy, vice chmn, and Gary M. Susnjara, chmn DFS/NY—to buy all shares in DFS, and also wrote into the agreement an option for Dorland to buy 100% of DFS common stock at any time. The companies began to form a bond in 1970 when they started handling each other's clients in respective markets. A more direct linkage occurred two years ago when Dorland acquired Dancer's London office. Dorland's parent, Saatchi & Saatchi Co. plc is providing funds for the buyout.

Annual review

DMM merged with Benton & Bowles in mid-year, giving the combined shop coverage in nine major U.S. cities and 24 foreign countries. Account losses, some client conflicts, caused a drop in U.S. billings of 9.9% and a 5.8% decline worldwide after factoring in a non-U.S. gain of 1.7%. Three departed because of client conflict—Strohs Schlitz Malt Liquor left B&B/NY with its $6 million in billings because of DMM's Budweiser business: Texaco left B&B/NY with its $24 million account because of Amoco's ($25 million) presence at DMM; Gaines took its $19 million account from B&B/NY because of DMM's Mars' Kal Kan ($21 million), which later left the agency, too. Big losses included AT&T at DMM/NY, worth $32 million; $35 million from Hardee's at B&B/NY; $17 million from Nabisco at B&B/NY; $15 million from Beatrice's Tropicana at B&B/NY; $10 million for P&G's Zest at B&B/NY; $19 million for Gaines Foods at B&B/NY. B&B's London media director and vice-chairman, Ray Morgan, left to form his own media-buying company after the merger and $54 million in media-buying business went with him. The London shop subsequently reported a drop of 24.7% in billings for 1985.

Some big gains included MCI which brought its consumer account to DM/B&B, which already handled MCI's business-to-business. MCI now represents a potential $40 million in business. Some $17 million came from ConAgra for frozen foods network buying, $10 million from A&P, $9 million from ConAgra's Armour Banquet Foods, $5 million each from Televideo Systems, Southern Electric Co., Wilson Sporting Goods, Wisconsin Milk Marketing Board and Jeffrey Martin (Ayds), and $4.5 million from General Motors. The agency estimates worldwide gains at 70 clients. Merger shakeout also affected the management side. DMB&B president/coo Hal Bay (former chairman/ceo DMM) was squeezed out in a power play between DMB&B chief Jack Bowen (former chairman/ceo B&B) and DMB&B USA president Roy Bostock (former president B&B). DMB&B's first order is to shore up accounts. B&B fired 50 in May, largely as a result of lost business. B&B has lost an estimated $127 million in billings the past two years. The combined agency had laid off 400 of its 6,500 worldwide workforce by the end of the year.

Strength in new and existing real estate-oriented clients helped stimulate billings by 36%, although the agency says current commercial and residential real estate slowdown will have an impact on 1986. Eastern Airlines (23% of total billings), Stuart Pharmaceuticals (15%) and Wyeth Labs (11%) each recorded increases of 5% to 10% in billings, and sizable new account gains contributed to a sharp billings increase of 27.9% at DMA, which became a division of Cunningham & Walsh (part of C&W Group) in late 1984. Expansion into the retail industry is the goal of W.B. Doner in 1986, which recorded a modest 3.4% increase in billings in 1985 largely because of a 5% increase in billings from its large Detroit office. Declines came from its LA and Baltimore shops. Already, in 1986 the agency has gained Genie Home Products (div of North American Philips), Delmar Window Covering and WDIV-TV, Detroit. Annual review

Growth of 15% in billings volume reflected a strong contribution from financial services. Doremus services four of the top five financial houses: Salomon Bros., Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and First Boston. Only Merrill Lynch is outside its purview. Financial advertising was one of three divisions created in a companywide reorganization that also set up a public relations unit in addition to a general advertising division.

Doremus moved into London to service 11 U.S.-based clients and seek new business. Expansion into Japan will occur in 1986, as will expansion of both the general advertising division, including its direct marketing activity, and the pr operations, which currently account for about one-third of Doremus' business. Doremus had its biggest January ever in 1986, but it is cautious about extending this optimism over the entire year because "clients are waiting to see the new tax laws before developing new products or advertising."

Annual review

Growth in U.S. billings of 11.6% was largely internally driven, although $43 million came through acquisition of Direct Response Group, Dallas, and York, Alpern Inc., a Los Angeles medical agency. DDB registered sizable losses in Polaroid and Atari, which took $45 million in business elsewhere, but existing clients, Nabisco and Brown & Williamson, covered that loss with $50 million in new assignments. These two accounts and Seagrams, Volkswagen, Audi and Clairol (Loving Care) should continue to stimulate billings in 1986, says the agency. On the personnel side, a new president, Peter Falcone came on board at DDB/NY, which suffered a loss in billings in 1985, and Alan Pando became president-ceo at DDB/West in early 1986. The agency's top creative officer, Roy Grace, recently left with two other DDB execs to form his own agency. DDB has lost a number of top officers since the death of founder William Bernbach in 1982.

DYR, a joint venture of Y&R and Dentsu, experience slow growth on the U.S. side as billings increased 5.9%. A general economic slowdown, less direct marketing activity caused by reduced client budgets, and the loss of Tomy Toys and Pacific Southwest Airline, which took their aggregate $18 million in billings elsewhere, were cited as major influences on growth. The agency formed a new subsidiary, DYR Public Affairs in New York.

After two years of corporate reorganization, reducing costs and eliminating unprofitable accounts, EJL showed a modest billings increase of 5.8%. Each of its three offices recorded gains, particularly the smallest in Chicago where the EJL auto div was consolidated and grew to 29 Cadillac and Chevrolet dealer association accounts. Promising for 1986 is Price Pfister, the brass faucet manufacturer that has tripled its billings from 1985. Under the reorganization, succession planning was achieved and three officers named divisional president: Richard J. Westman, Dennis R. Coe and Dean R. Laws.

For the second year in a row, William Esty suffered a decline (1.9%) in both gross income and billings. The agency gained Travelers Corp. worth $14 million, Dramatic Results from Prince Matchabelli, and Texaco, an account normally worth $24 million, but likely to drop because of its costly legal entanglement with Pennzoil. Pulled from the agency were media buying for Chesebrough-Pond's, R.J. Reynolds' Winston cigaret account, the $13.5 million Seagram's account (Wolfschmidt, Black Tower Wines, Myer's Jamaican Rum, Leroux Cordials) and the $10 million American Home Products (Riopan and Riopan Plus) account.

Gains annualized at $24 million and losses of $8 million basically defined the year for Evans in which billings increased 17%, or $18 million. Two big accounts acquired at midyear, Arizona State Lottery and Straw Hat, should each materialize into $4 million accounts in 1986. The agency went on an acquisition binge, buying Barney McClure in San Francisco, Londergan Pariseau in Denver, and hiring the staff of Bruster Archer Ball in San Francisco. Welcome to the real world.

Products live (and die) in the real world.

Their life expectancy depends on real people and whether they see a product as having any real benefit.

Yet most advertising today feels, well, like advertising. Contrived. Artificial. Anything but real.

At Bonneville Media Communications, the real world and the ad world work together. As a result, our work stands out from the clutter.

We've won every major advertising award in the U.S. and Europe. Articles in Advertising Age, Ad Week, Madison Avenue and The New York Times have recently applauded our efforts. And best of all, we've won the hearts of 300,000 viewers who have written to say 'thanks'.

At Bonneville, we think it's important that advertising live in the real world.

Because, after all, that's where your product lives.

We'd like you to see our reel. Call Jeff Hilton at (801) 237-1500. Bonneville Media Communications, 179 Social Hall Ave., Salt Lake City, Utah 84111.

A 1.8% growth in billings primarily reflected the loss of about $12 million in billings from Valvoline Motor Oil, which pulled its account in late 1984. The loss from that account held 25 years by the agency will be rebuilt in 1986 with $15 million in combined billings coming from new accounts, Hecks stores, West Virginia Lottery, Piper Aircraft and a McDonald's regional account. The 1985 new accounts added to 1986 gains so far—Big Drum ice cream and Kardex informations services—will provide annualized billings of $100 million in 1986, according to the agency.

Annual review

A phenomenal billings growth of 148% for FMR, named agency of the year in 1983 by Advertising Age, was credited largely to new business gains paced by Armour frozen foods with a potential of $12 million, and the Wall Street Journal and Federal Express ZAP Mail, both possible $10 million accounts. Losses took away only $2.5 million in billings. FMR's success attracted acquisition-minded Scali, McCabe, Sloves, which purchased 75% of the agency in February, 1986. FMR will remain an independent organization within the Scali, McCabe, Sloves network, which is part of the Ogilvy Group. The agency in 1985 lost the "Rice" in its name when Nancy Rice, vp-exec art director, left to form Rice & Rice.

Annual review

New client Colgate-Palmolive ($100 million in annualized billings), helped push FCB worldwide billings up 6% despite such departures as Lorillard's Kent cigarets ($15 million) and Arco ($10 million). Non-U.S. billings actually dropped 1.7% because of agency consolidation and weakness in some traditionally strong markets. The publicly-held agency recorded a decline in net income of 4% to $16.4 million on record revenues of $287 million, up 4.2%. Management shifts have included naming Abbott C. Jones president of parent Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, a title held by John E. O'Toole, who retired January, 1986. Mr. Jones was president of FCB/Associated Communications, the FCB specialty shops.

On the agency side, Jack M. Young, president of FCB/East, resigned in March, 1986, over a growing "divergence in viewpoints" with Mr. Brown. He supervised FCB/New York and the Greenwich, Conn.-based North Castle Partners. Industry predictions is that FCB will acquire an agency to beef up its New York operations. In 1986, the agency has gained Mattel, worth $20 million in billings, American Medical Intl HMO worth $15 million, and Gillette in France. Also the agency may be the subject of a takeover bid by Shamrock Holdings, an LA-based diversified investment firm, which is boosting its ownership from 7.4% to 25% of stock. FCB has adopted "poison pill" procedures designed to shield it from takeover.

New business from IBM, particularly printers, and the launch of Richland 25s for Brown & Williamson were major factors in a billings increase of 16.7% at Geer DuBois. That growth is expected to continue into 1986 as it rolls out Richland 25s's 100mm cigarets and as three or four new clients are expected to assign the agency their business, predicts Geer DuBois.

Annual review

Nominal growth of 1.2% in U.S. billings was attributed to delays in new launches by existing clients and the departure of ESPN. A drop in employes to 180 from 210 was more a reflection of the sifting down of 1983 acquisition, Kurtz & Tarlow, than of any account stagnation. The agency's objective is to seek out household products and alcoholic beverages. Geers U.K. billings, equal to about a third of its total business, registered a modest 2.4% increase. Geers sold 20% of its equity to Paris-based Eurocom Group in February, 1985. In London, it merged Geers Gross/West into Geers Gross Advertising Ltd.

De Garmo Inc., New York, fell from the agency charts in 1980 when it was swallowed up by Bloomfield, Mich.-based D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius (now D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles) which needed to strengthen its New York office. The marriage didn't take, at least for John de Garmo, president of DM&M/de Garmo. Growth from client, Hasbro Inc., gave Griffin Bacal the phenomenal 150% increase in billings and built the agency support staff from 38 to 152. The agency gained Milton Bradley and its Playskool subsidiary at the end of 1984 when MB became part of Hasbro Inc., which recorded total advertising of $84 million in 1984, according to the Advertising Age 100 Leaders issue. Milton Bradley alone could generate up to $25 million in billings, and Playskool, another $10 million at the agency.

Known as a business-to-business agency, Group 3hree is moving more into user advertising, marked by the user (and business-to-business) work handled for new gain UniDon, which is expanding into 25% of the U.S. in 1986. The agency's loss of First Bankers Corp. when it was bought by First Union Corp. reflects a need for Group 3hree to seek out financial service accounts outside the state. With passage of the interstate banking law in 1985 (it permits reciprocal banking in 11 Southeastern states), there were 26 bank holding companies in Florida. Now there are two as a result of acquisition. To service clients outside Florida, Group 3hree plugs into TAAN, Transworld Advertising Agency Network. The agency strategy—to look for a small number of high quality accounts—is panning out already in 1986. Agency execs predict a 20% growth mainly from new business compared with an 8.8% growth in billings in 1985.

HCM, a joint venture between Paris-based Eurocom (51%) and Young & Rubicam, New York (49%), recorded an over-all billings growth of 3.9%, a figure affected by a drop of 18.9% in U.S. billings. The U.S. decline primarily was a result of reduced spending in the post-Olympic year from clients like Beatrice, which spent nearly $30 million in annualized billings in 1984. The agency lost $8 million in annualized billings from the loss of four clients, but gained $40 million in potential billings from the acquisition of client Jack In The Box ($23 million), Empire Blue Cross/Blue Shield ($5 million), New Zealand Lamb ($5 million), and Columbia Pictures tv syndication ($2 million). The first two gains added to existing client, Dannon, will account for $60 million in annualized billings. In 1986, HCM has picked up the Manhattan Cable and Columbian Savings & Loan accounts, and could get Peugeot Motors of America. HCM already handles the Peugeot dealers overseas account, which is worth an estimated $60-$75 million.

Sales promotion and direct marketing are two divisions expected to grow in billings by 25% in 1986 when a full-year's impact of new clients—$15 million in new billings—is expected to be felt. This new business added at mid-year, in particular First Atlanta and Quincy Steak House (Spartan Foods), push up billings by 3.9%, but should help generate 9% growth in 1986 when billings will hit an estimated $85 million, says the agency. New account gains led by John Hancock Cos. with $20 million in annualized billings brought in more than $36 million in new business, and existing client growth added another $5 million as HHCC recorded a 24% increase in billings. The agency's big winner was its New York office whose accounts, led by Irish Tourism Board and Aer Lingus, pushed up billings by 668% over 1984. The Los Angeles office, however, was closed and will relocate in San Francisco. The agency strengthened its overseas business via merger in London with Aspect Ltd., and entered into a joint venture in Australia with Magnus Nankervis & Curl, Sydney.

Ingalls, which recorded a slight decline of 0.8% in billings, will merge this September with Quinn & Johnson, the BBDO direct marketing subsidiary. The resulting agency, named Ingalls, Quinn & Johnson, will have combined billings of $133.6 million, considering Quinn & Johnson's estimated billings of $49.3 million in 1985. The merged shops will have to sort out account conflicts in retail, restaurants and auto dealer associations.

Ingalls had growth of $22 million from existing clients. However, reduced spending came from the $5 million account for Dennison Co. Dennison acquired Elephant Floppy Disk Co., but did not spend up to its potential because of poor results from Elephant Floppy. Dennison's over-all budget underwent a drastic cut. New clients, Cabot Stain and Infocom will provide $1.5 million-plus each in new billings in 1986.

New business gained by Ketchum—American Honda Motor Co.'s Acura div., Pizza Hut regional divisions, Roman Meal, Phar-Mor discount drugs, Crown Zellerbach and Four Seasons—have the potential to produce $45 million in annualized billings in 1986. Minor contributions from these clients helped produce a net gain for the agency of $11 million in billings, or a 3% increase. Client, American Honda Motor Co., prompted the agency to open a Los Angeles office to service its business, and Ketchum sold its Houston office to First Marketing Group. Ketchum Direct closed its office and moved the $7 million Bell Atlantic account from there to New York. Ketchum PR bought Bohle Co., Los Angeles, and renamed it Ketchum/Bohle PR. In 1986, the agency lost Ketchum/San Francisco president, Don Sullivan, to JWT USA/Chicago where he was named general manager. New client in 1986, Melitta, is expected to stimulate billings.

All are in the $4 million to $6 million billings range. Of the $18 million increase in billings, more than $10 million came from existing clients and the rest was in new business. A Mickelberry agency, LCF&L expects billings in 1986 to top the 9.3% increase it recorded in 1985, a year in which the agency lost its large Heublein business worth $18 million but picked up National Distillers in the spring and six McDonald's owner-operator associations at yearend. The McDonald's business put the agency in the fastfood industry for the first time. Already in 1986 the agency has gained Pall Malls and Tareyton cigarets from American Tobacco and Clairol's Condition haircare line. The agency added Tom Lawson from then Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson as president and put his name on the shingle. The McDonald's business soon followed.

In 1986, Leber Katz expects internal growth alone will top its billings growth of 4% in 1985. That growth will come partially from two big clients, Reynolds' Tobacco, for which the agency is launching Ritz cigarets in April after considerable testing, and Campbell's Soup, for which the agency launched its dry soup and recipe mix in the fall. Those billings will mature in 1986. The agency added a number of key people, senior vp level and above: Marvin Honig, chief creative officer, a DDB alum; Charles Evans, senior vp/mgmt rep, formerly at FCB & O&M; Dave Fulton, senior vp-media director, from Y&R; Howard Berg, senior vp/mgmt super, formerly with Calvillo Shevack & Partners; Ellen Perless, senior vp, creative director, a JWT & Y&R alum.

Annual review

Billings shot up 23%, an increase heavily influenced by $10 million in annualized billings each from new accounts, New York Air and Seagrams. Existing client, Citizen Watch, continued to spend heavily ($15-$20 million in new business) as did the eight Subaru divisions ($12 million). LHS&B's Boca Raton, Fla., and San Antonio shops primarily service the latter client, the agency's largest with projected annualized billings of $25 million. A majority interest in the agency was sold June, 1985, to Grey Advertising. Operations remain autonomous in hopes of retaining competitive clients in the automotive and watch fields.

A similar $10 million increase in billings is expected in 1986 as in 1985 as activity for new clients gained in late 1985, Pinkerton Tobacco's four products and Empire Airlines (bought by current client, Piedmont Airlines), begins to unfold. Internal growth at McKinney is generally good for about 40% of increased billings annually, according to the agency. In 1986, the agency gained Valley National Bank in Phoenix, its first entry into the Southwest, and will pick up Bankers Trust in South Carolina which was acquired by MS&R's existing client, North Carolina National Bank.

A 26.1% increase in overseas billings was the primary reason over-all billings rose 18.3% at Medicus, a subsidiary of DMB&B. The non-U.S. increase primarily related to two acquisitions: ADA Group in the U.K. in May, and an increase in equity from 49% to 100% of Creaccion in Spain, giving Medicus a presence in two of the world's eight largest healthcare markets. Medicus is projecting a 14% increase in 1986 in billings, an expansion including two new operations: A consumer advertising division in the U.S., and a second division formed from the Medicus agency in Germany.

Existing clients' cautious about expanding budgets, and a number of client losses helped contribute to an over-all decline of 27% in billings, according to the agency. New gains have picked up in 1986 as a total of $5 million in new business has come in from Long Island Savings Bank and Continental Insurance (corp). The agency was restructured into two divisions,

Needham, which spent its first full year of operation under its new streamlined management team, recorded a 9.1% increase in U.S. billings and 8.4% increase in worldwide billings. Highlights included a spurt in billings of $21 million on the West Coast, including the California Lottery (worth $15 million in business); the addition of Tony Vanderwarker from Needham/Chicago to the New York management team; opening of a Washington D.C. office; a 97% growth in the pr division, attributable to expansion in Chicago, New York and LA; putting the worldwide organization under leadership of John Bradstock from USP Needham Australia. Pepsico's Frito-Lay—Cheetos, Ruffles and new product, McCracken's apple chips—was a major acquisition when Frito-Lay split with Y&R. The agency also gained General Mills' Nature Valley Boppers ($25 million), Campbell Foods Seafood en Croute ($12 million) and Clorox home products ($4.3 million). Needham Harper also acquired Lane & Huff Advertising, San Diego, billing $10 million. Although working hard on new business, Needham Harper expects growth to be largely internal.

Annual review

Corporate restructuring begun in May created a separate board for publicly-held Ogilvy Group and another for Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, the primary network. Cole & Weber expanded into Canada and O&M San Francisco was set up as an independent agency under the name, Hal Riney & Partners, spun off Jan. 1, 1986 with O&M holding a minority interest. Another major O&M group, Scali McCabe & Sloves, acquired Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligott Rice in February, 1986. The agency expects to maintain a 17% growth in profit and 14.4% growth in revenue recorded in 1985. Client spending is holding steady, and work for new accounts, Hardee's restaurant and Polaroid, the latter on the international front, and additional assignments from Seagrams will build the revenue base during the year.

Annual review

Telephone Marketing Programs had a 24% increase in billings compared with an industrywide increase of 9%, a spread TMP credits to a large increase in new clients at its seven major offices and six sales units nationwide. TMP says more clients are now seeking direction in Yellow Pages marketing because the market has grown more complicated from government deregulation, an offshoot of which has been a plethora of new telephone directories. In April, 1986, the telemarketer will open TMP Japan Inc., Tokyo, in partnership with Japanese. In France, the agency is in the initial phase of making ad placement via electronic directory.

Annual review

J. Walter Thompson turned in a strong 15.8% gain in U.S. billings while non-U.S. billings increased only 1.1% for a worldwide net gain of 8.8%. U.S. gains came from new accounts: Emery Worldwide ($20 million) and Sears Discover Card (worth $20 million). Growth came from existing clients Ford (about $50 million for Taurus), Quaker Oats (new spending worth $20 million), Burger King ($30 million for beefier Whopper) and the addition of Lowenbrau by Miller Brewing (already spending $60 million on High Life at JWT). Losses were minor in comparison: Labatts ($30 million); Kuppenheimer ($11 million). J. Walter Thompson Direct was formed as cornerstone of a network of five direct response specialties. Among many major management changes at JWT in 1986 included the naming of Joseph W. O'Donnell of the Chicago office, as ceo replacing Don Johnston, who will turn over his chairmanship to Mr. O'Donnell at year-end when he retires. Mr. Johnston will continue to head up JWT Group. J. Walter Thompson Co. vice chairman Wally O'Brien, in contention for the head post, resigned. Donald G. Sullivan, president, Ketchum/San Francisco, succeeded Mr. O'Donnell as general manager, JWT USA/Chicago. In February, 1986, JWT gained a portion of the Eastman Kodak business it did not already have when Kodak moved its consumer electronics division and some of its international film and camera business worth $35 million to JWT.

Annual review
Growth at Towne, Silverstein Rotter came largely from existing accounts, led by the new wine cooler entry at Canandaiqua Wine Co., an account with annualized billings of about $25 million. Canandaiqua, which began with the agency in 1964 billing $50,000, now represents about 20% of annual billings. In 1986, Panache toy company, which is licensed by Coleco to do Cabbage Patch miniatures, came aboard replacing CBS's toy division scuttled by the big media company. Panache will launch in the spring Wonder Whims, illusions developed by magicians Doug & Debbie Henning, and Learning Curves, a soft toy for pre-school children.

Quirks and quakes
Growing with a client can be traumatic as seen in the fate of Parker Advertising. The Palos Verdes Peninsula agency handled Nissan for 16 years before Nissan split in 1977 to find a larger agency, taking its $40 million car and pickup account, or 93% of Parker billings. Parker had just built up its account and media personnel when the client fled the coup, and was soon to resign the rest of its advertising accounts and pull down its agency shingle.

Annual review
New client gains and no losses, activity defined by the agency as "a result of hard work and luck," helped push Tracy-Locke billings upward 13.5%. The BBDO Intl. subsidiary lists other highlights as opening a Los Angeles office mainly to service Taco Bell, but which soon won Princess Cruises, and luring Joy Cummings from Ted Bates as exec creative director. In 1986, the agency gained Vuarnet sunglasses and lost Labatts beer, which Dallas-based Tracy-Locke no longer wanted to serve because of its distant location in Stamford, Conn. The agency predicts no huge increase in billings in 1986. Clients are in a wait-and-see attitude. Also, a T-L strategy in 1986 is to consolidate 1985 gains.

Annual review
An even split in billings between an increasing number of product launches and more aggressive ad spending on current products helped generate a 21% increase in billings at Tucker Wayne & Co. In January, 1986, Sun Bank of Florida, sister to client Trust Company Bank, joined the agency's client roster. Both are members of regional bank holding company, SunTrust. Tucker Wayne, which expects a 20% growth this year, foresees a "healthy, growing market" through the end of 1986. It defines its market reach as "anything south of New York City and east of the Mississippi."

The loss of the $21 million Seagrams account held at Warwick the past 46 years, reflecting a move by Seagrams to fold its business into three shops from seven, held down the year's billings increase at Warwick to 3.7%. In the meantime, the agency won business presentations—Crafted With Pride, Jockey Intl, Seagrams corporate campaign—with materials ultimately used in subsequent campaigns, a testament to creative director Bob Fiore. WRG underwent major management changes at yearend. In Los Angeles, Larry Olshan (brother of Ken, WRG Worldwide chairman) became president after Richard Kelly departed for Scali McCabe Sloves, Los Angeles. The Los Angeles shop also lost $30 million in accounts (Hills Bros., Supercuts, Foodmaker's Jack In The Box). In New York where new introductions have been at a peak, the creative side was beefed up with the elevation of Charles Moss to chief creative officer and the naming of three new creative directors. WRG was active in tests for six new products—Procter & Gamble's Banner paper towels and toilet tissue, Prell conditioner and shampoo, and Pringles sour cream and onion; Philip Morris' Dunhill Lights; Ralston Purina's Catviar and Goody Two Chews. Added at year-end were National Enquirer and Ken's Restaurants, infusing a potential $20 million and $4 million in billings, respectively, into WRG in 1986. Overseas, WRG/London merged with Holmes, Knight, Ritchie to form Holmes, Knight, Ritchie/WRG.

This Y&R direct marketing subsidiary won a host of new clients, including Colgate-Palmolive, Gillette, Kodak and Charles of the Ritz, and saw the return of Book-of-the-Month Club after a year's hiatus from the agency while recording a billings gain of 18.6%. Key to billings in 1986: the addition of AT&T Opportunity Calling, gained at the end of 1985; American Airlines AAdvantage Program, won early this year, and the resurgence in spending by traditional direct marketing companies, evidenced by the recent addition of Columbia Video Tape Club to the account roster. Annual review

Wyse's growth of 0.6% in billings, spurred by major contributions from Bonnie Bell, Sherwin-Williams, Gencorp and others, represented a slight recovery from its major 1984 loss of Goodyear Tire & Rubber auto stores. Existing clients, Stouffer Hotels, Smuckers and Vitamaster, an exercise line, showed strong growth. Wyse is high on its just developing Wyse PR and Design Wyse divisions. Its Marketing Decisions Group, formerly supplier of research analysis for internal use, began selling its services outside the agency. Annual review

Y&R grew 11.7% in over-all billings, thanks to a 24% increase in its foreign contribution that propped up a domestic growth of 5.4%. Big gains came from Walt Disney Productions ($30-$60 million); consolidation of AT&T's $80 million Opportunity Calling program; Merrill Lynch ($30 million corp campaign in 1985), although Merrill Lynch left Y&R in 1986 with its over-all $45 million general ad/direct marketing account; U.S. Postal Service Express Mail ($30.6 million); Adidas ($22 million worldwide), and Metropolitan Life campaign ($20 million). It lost Frito-Lay ($17 million) after 22 years, and in January, 1986, lost Eastman Kodak's instant camera and films when Kodak dropped out of that business, but it quickly replenished the loss by sharing a $35 million-billings package with JWT for Kodak's consumer electronics div and some of its international film and cameras. Y&R figures include its percentage ownership in DYR (50%) and HCM (49) and its Burson-Marsteller (100%) pr unit.

VALUE-ADDED ADVERTISING

It's yours with the Journal of Accountancy.

We're able to guarantee value-added advertising with a heavily involved, CPA-dominated circulation of 280,000. A circulation that grows by some 10,000. Every year.

Your ads in the Journal also add value by consistently reaching and influencing decision makers:

- 93% of our public accounting subscribers are owners, principles or partners of their firms.
- In addition to their internal decision-making clout, these professionals advise and influence between 101 and 200 clients each.
- 65% of our public sector subscribers have the product/service selection power to go with their top management titles.

The Journal adds value to your advertising. Without adding to the size of your budget. In fact, we offer you by far the lowest cost per thousand (CPM) in the accounting field. (To say nothing of the fact that the Journal has the only audited circulation in the field.) And our advertising rates are far below those charged by general business publications.

Need to know more about how to add value to your advertising? Call Dick Flynn COLLECT at (212) 575-6286.

Color Consciousness
It's why consumers prefer Hanes.
We make it our business to know about consumers and the colors they like...and our hot fashion colors for Spring and Summer 1986 prove it. They include Jade, Fuchsia, Radiant Yellow, Royal Blue, Poppy Orange, and White. How do we know they'll be hot? We keep a close watch on the market and talk to fashion experts who help us get inside consumers' heads to find out what they really want.
And we don't just know about them. They know about us—and we're building on that recognition with national consumer advertising. So when you decide what to carry in 1986, we suggest you do what consumers do. Keep Hanes fashion colors in mind.

NOTES: Dollars in millions.

Agencies appearing in this 10-year review are the top 25 agencies in 1985 in world gross income. Each agency's dollar value on which the annual percentage growth and annual volume growth were based include subsidiaries from the year their financial results were consolidated into the parent. There is some "double-dipping" on this chart. For example, the gross income and billings for subsidiaries, William Esty, HCM, Cole & Weber, and Scali, McCabe, Sloves, were included in their parent totals from the year they were bought to the present. Individual agency totals also include numbers for agencies bought, merged and folded (losing their identity) into the parent not only for the year purchased, but for preceding years to 1976. This provides a historical reading of the agency as it exists today. An example of this would be PCB International's purchase of NCK (Norman, Craig & Kummel) Organization in 1982. NCK gross income and billings for 1976-1982 were thus merged into PCB.

NOTES: Dollars in millions.

Agencies appearing in this 10-year retrospective are the top 25 agencies in 1985 in world gross income. Each agency's dollar value on which the annual percentage growth and annual volume growth were based include subsidiaries from the year their financial results were consolidated into the parent. There is some "double-dipping" on this chart. For example, the gross income and billings for subsidiaries, William Esty, HCM, Cole & Weber, and Scali, McCabe, Sloves, were included in their parent totals from the year they were bought to the present. Individual agency totals also include numbers for agencies bought, merged and folded (losing their identity) into the parent not only for the year purchased, but for preceding years to 1976. This provides a historical reading of the agency as it exists today. An example of this would be FCB International's purchase of NCK (Norman, Craig & Kummel) Organization in 1982. NCK gross income and billings for 1979-1982 were thus merged into FCB.

You Know who won,
but do you really know the score?
All the planning. The careful spending. You've invested a lot in your sports sponsorship program.
But there's no number for you on the scoreboard. In the costs versus results game, are you winning?
It's really not as intangible as you might think.
Whenever your company's name or logo appears on screen, clear and in-focus, our trained staff monitors the exposure, second-by-second, and determines the dollar value.

Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver appeared on the charts 10 years ago as Levine, Huntley, Schmidt, Plapler & Beaver, an agency begun as a direct mail house for soft goods (dresses primarily) producers in 1922 under brothers Mervin and Jesse Levine. In 1965, the agency began its transition to a general consumer agency as Bob Schmidt joined as account super, eventually becoming a partner of Mervin Levine, who had bought out his brother. Then came partner, Chet Huntley of Huntley and Brinkley news team fame. Rechristened Levine, Huntley, Schmidt Inc., the agency added Larry Plapler and Allan Beaver, two creatives, in 1972. Saatchi passes JWT Group in income

Saatchi & Saatchi Co. continued its upward spiral among agency groups in 1985, stepping ahead of JWT Group in world gross income with a 37% increase, but remaining distant to No. 1 Interpublic Group of Cos.

The Saatchi & Saatchi surge to No. 2 came primarily through acquisition and the inclusion of nonadvertising units only on the income side of the ledger. JWT Group remained No. 2 in terms of capitalized billings—which reflect only the advertising side of a group's performance—with $3.82 billion compared with Saatchi's $3.19 billion.

Unlike an agency's fee income, nonadvertising returns are not capitalized. Fees are capitalized by multiplying them by 6.67 to arrive at an equivalent to media billings. The multiplier treats the fee income as if it were the 15% commission earned from media billings.

Interpublic remained No. 1 in income and billings with $707.4 million and $4.75 billion, respectively, in 1985 for a year-to-year increase of 15% for both.

The Saatchi group piled up the gross income in nonagency acquisitions and activity, including returns from market research units, Yankelovich, Skelly & White and Clancy Shulman, and pr unit, Rowland Co. The group also purchased Grandfield Rork Collins, ranked the 20th largest agency in the U.K. going into 1985, and Hayhurst, No. 12 in Canada.

The agency units of Interpublic, relatively quiet for a number of years, have become active. The group's Marschalk Campbell-Ewald Worldwide unit broke up in the beginning of 1986 as Marschalk merged with Lowe Howard-Spink, the U.K. agency previously linked with Campbell-Ewald.

The resulting agency, named Lowe Marschalk, gathered several other Campbell-Ewald units around it to build a network with billings estimated at $550 million. Interpublic kept a 38.1% interest in the network.

Again at the first of the year, McCann-Erickson purchased Sieber & McIntyre, the Chicago medical agency that recorded gross income of $12.3 million on billings of $82.3 million in 1985.

The holding companies are not ranked in this issue because they are not agencies. The accompanying chart illustrates how they line up against agencies in this issue, many of which are their own subsidiaries.

HIGHLIGHTS

Network order changeth 1
CBS Inc. last week rebuffed a $3.7 billion buyout offer from oilman billionaire Marvin Davis, but the price of staying independent will continue to escalate. The Davis bid, in fact, put into sharper focus the fact that all three major tv networks—CBS, NBC and ABC—are in the process of putting traditions behind them.

NBC Olympic deal signed 1
NBC signed to broadcast the 1988 Summer Olympics from Korea, but the revenue-sharing plan in the agreement is being termed a "face-saving" device for the Koreans. Sources said NBC does not expect to pay more than $300 million.

Baseball's family pitch 3
There is no doubt this is Major League Baseball's year of the family. Nearly every team is making a pitch to lure mom, dad and the kids into stadiums. The family concept is being used to counter baseball's well publicized drug problems. It also is the hook baseball marketers believe will increase attendance.

Opel win free for Troost 3
General Motors last week announced it is moving the $24 million-to-$28 million Adam Opel account in Germany from McCann-Erickson, its agency for the last 57 years, to Troost Lowe-Marschalk, which did not even pitch for the account.

L'Envie suit settled 6
S.C. Johnson & Son and Cosmair have agreed on new labeling and advertising disclaimers to settle a lawsuit that jeopardized Johnson's $12 million launch of its L'Envie by Agree Parfum shampoo and conditioner line.

P&G goes liquid 12
Procter & Gamble's decision to test-market a liquid version of its Cheer laundry detergent indicates that major soap companies now agree with consumers that liquids are the detergent market's future.

Tom's Maine chance 71
Although Tom's of Maine may have started out as a lark, it is becoming, if not big business, nothing to brush off.

Retailers get small 83
Two of the nation's top retailers last week announced expansion plans based on a "Smaller is better" philosophy. Sears, Roebuck & Co. said that this year it will open up to 50 paint-and-hardware stores, part of a new emphasis on developing smaller-scale specialty outlets. Rival Montgomery Ward & Co. said it will convert 117 of its current stores, about 40% of its chain, to "Seven Worlds of Ward's" specialty stores.

NEW PRODUCTS

Milking calcium 28
Calcium is fast becoming the "mineral of the month," finding its way into many product offerings. As always, the question is: Is it here to stay?

FEATURES

A Walz with a reel 40
Had David Ogilvy made sinus medicine sound more appealing, Ken Walz might not have left advertising for video production. And Mr. Walz would not have produced the "Girls Just Want to Have Fun" music video that made Cyndi Lauper a pop phenomenon and made him what he is today: One of the most accomplished music video producers and an outspoken critic of advertising's attempts to mimic music video style in commercials.

INTERNATIONAL

Japanese cigaret tax 58
Foreign tobacco marketers in Tokyo are facing a new excise tax on cigarets that is expected to seriously hurt their efforts to carve out a bigger slice of the $14.8 billion Japanese cigaret market.

Relaxed U.K. client conflict 58
British advertisers, caught in a wave of corporate mergers like those in the U.S., are relaxing their attitudes about client conflict. They are redefining "conflict" as a situation in which a marketer's agency handles a product in direct competition with the marketer's own, rather than an agency merely handling other accounts for a rival.

More tv ads in India 59
Despite an ongoing controversy over the role of tv, tv advertising has arrived in India and is expected to grow dramatically in the next five years. Today there are 5.2 million tv sets reaching 50 million people at peak times, compared with about 450,000 sets 10 years ago.

Grey to fly with airline account

By GARY LEVIN

Northwest Orient Airlines has picked incumbent Grey Advertising, Minneapolis, to handle its combined U.S. passenger account —estimated to be worth in excess of $50 million—following Northwest's acquisition of Minneapolis-based Republic Airlines (AA, Jan. 27).

Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, which had held the $25 million Republic account, also had pitched for the combined assignment (AA, Feb. 17). Northwest's decision for Grey leaves Dancer open to pursue other airline business.

The consolidation "allows for advance planning of the merged airlines' launch advertising pro-

Bergin: Eased off Coke biz

By STEWART ALTER

NEW YORK—It wasn't John Bergin's idea to start up his own agency within McCann-Erickson. He would have preferred remaining the top creative exec on the Coca-Cola account.

But Coca-Cola felt differently. The client had McCann gently ease Mr. Bergin off its business, and McCann accommodated both Coke and Mr. Bergin by setting up the John Bergin Group, a team of top creatives who will hunt for new business and troubleshoot on McCann accounts.

Mr. Bergin, who earlier had played a major role both at BBDO in the development of the "Pepsi generation" cam-

News spotlight powers Tylenol ad recall

Visibility increases after poisoning

By JULIE FRANZ

Consumers often confuse what they see in advertising with what they see on the nightly news, and such has been the case with Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol.

Tylenol's share of first mentions last month in ADVERTISING AGE's adWatch survey of advertising awareness zoomed 12.1 percentage points to 33.7% after remaining relatively unchanged for the past year.

As has happened before, both to Tylenol and other consumer products, advertising awareness was boosted by events unrelated to advertising.

Advertising for Tylenol was pulled from the air Feb. 11, one day after a New York woman died after taking cyanide-tainted capsules of Extra-Strength Tylenol.

The pain reliever remained the subject of public scrutiny for several weeks as capsules were removed from store shelves across the country and replaced by caplets.

The chairman of J&J's McNeil Consumer Products Co. unit appeared in a tv commercial that broke Feb. 19, one day before the monthly adWatch survey was completed, asking consumers to trade in their Tylenol capsules for Tylenol caplets.

Brand advertising, which, ironically, shows testimonials from contented users, resumed March 7. Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, handles.

AdWatch is a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of product categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In February, 1,000 adults were questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

Also making headlines in February—although hardly as ominous as those relating to Tylenol—was Burger King's recently ended "Herb" campaign. BK president Jay Darling called the campaign a disappointment except for the increased awareness Herb gave the chain (AA, March 24).

And Herb did help No. 2 Burger King's ad awareness. In February, 23% of the 1,000 consumers polled named Burger King first when asked to name the first fast-food ad that came to mind. That represented a five-percentage-point increase over the January results, when BK was named first by 18% of those surveyed.

BK's share of first mentions has been steadily rising since Herb hit the airwaves in late November, climbing 12.9 points from November through February.

Conversely, McDonald's share of ad awareness has dropped 9.4 points from November through February—a time when McDonald's was spending an average $5 million a week on tv advertising for its McD.L.T. sandwich.

Last month, Big Mac's share of first mentions in the aided fast-food category fell 5.7 percentage points to 39.6%. McDonald's launched a pool of five new McD.L.T. spots during the Jan. 26 Super Bowl XX telecast.

Wendy's International's advertising remains No. 3 with 9.5% of first mentions. Hardee's Food Systems is No. 4 with 2.7% of first mentions, and Jack in the Box reappeared in the top five for the first time in nine months with 1.2% of first mentions.

In the soft-drink category, Pepsi-Cola's share of first mentions climbed 9.4 points to 32.9%, putting the brand in the driver's seat for the first time since April, 1985, when its popular "New generation" campaign featuring singer Lionel Richie first aired.

Once again it's a star-studded approach that has put Pepsi in the No. 1 position for ad awareness among soft-drink marketers.

Spots featuring actor Michael J. Fox fashioning a can of Pepsi from a paper photocopy broke Feb. 2. It was followed Feb. 10 by a spot entitled "Telekinesis," showing a group of students prompting another student to move a Coke can by thinking of refreshment. Instead, an entire Pepsi machine rises in the air.

Pepsi has a chance to make even greater gains against Coke in the March survey, because the campaign's two-minute spot featuring "Miami Vice" star Don Johnson and rocker Glenn Frey broke during the Grammy Awards telecast Feb. 25, five days after the Febru-

Coca-Cola, whose score fell 4.6 points to 30% of first mentions, dropped into an unaccustomed second-place slot.

But it also is poised for an awareness comeback: New commercials for Coke ("Catch the wave"), Coca-Cola Classic ("Red, white and you") and diet Coke (more stars bopping to "Just for the taste of it") broke the week of Feb. 19, too late to make a mark in February's survey data but just in time to make trouble for Pepsi.

Seven-Up Co.'s "Feels so good comin' down" campaign for 7UP so far has had little effect on the brand's share of top-of-mind ad awareness.

Its advertising remained No. 3 in the category with 4.1% of first mentions.

Diet Coke keeps the No. 4 spot with 2.1% last month, while Coca-Cola Co.'s Sprite is again No. 5 with 1.9% of first mentions.

Competitors continued to fight it out for air travelers in the airline category by offering lower and lower fares.

Eastern Air Lines' share of first mentions rose 4.5 points to 15.3%, putting it in first place ahead of United with 14.7% of first mentions.

American fell into third, dropping 3.2 points to 8.4%.

The top 10 best recalled (unaided) ads in February were for, in descending order, Burger King, McDonald's, Tylenol, Coca-Cola, Pepsi, Ford, Miller/Miller Lite, Budweiser/Bud Light (Anheuser-Busch), Wendy's and Procter & Gamble's Tide.#

Tom's of Maine rolls natural antiperspirant

Joins successful toothpaste

By NANCY GIGES

Although Tom's of Maine may have started out as a lark, it is becoming, if not big business, nothing to brush off.

The Kennebunk, Me.-based company, which was born when the Chappell family left Philadelphia for a more basic life style (AA, July 15), is introducing an all-natural antiperspirant nationally in April and expanding the ad campaign that has enabled Tom's all-natural toothpaste to lay claim to the No. 5 position in the dentifrice category in Portland, Me.

Although Tom's has run magazine ads nationally on a limited basis for the toothpaste, it has focused most of its efforts on a radio and Sunday supplement campaign in Portland. The company spent, at a national rate of about $3 million, tens of millions of dollars less than the leading brands.

But with that effort, the brand grew to surpass all of the smaller products, trailing only Procter & Gamble's Crest, Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s Colgate, Beecham Products' Aqua-fresh and Lever Bros.' Aim. The brand's share has grown from less than 1% to nearly 3%.

That advertising is set to break in Boston in April, Providence and Hartford in June, Washington in July and San Francisco in September. For next year, the company has set its sights on the Big 3 metropolitan areas: New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Company general manager John Eldredge said the same creative, which was produced in-house, will be used for some time because it will be new to those areas. The company uses Vitt Media International, New York, for placement.

Tom's of Maine aims its products and advertising at what Mr. Eldredge called the "societally conscious and experiential" consumer, running on classical, news/talk and album-oriented-rock radio stations.

In Portland, Tom's will replace its test campaign for toothpaste with another for the antiperspirant and, if successful, it will roll into the expansion markets in conjunction with the toothpaste advertising. The two products will very likely be promoted together at that time, Mr. Eldredge said.

Even though Tom's is introducing its all-natural antiperspirant nationally with no advertising, Mr. Eldredge said getting shelf space has not been much of a problem, especially after the company gained experience in struggling for space on the dentifrice shelves in the midst of the plaque/tartar war.#

Dailies fare best with December ad sales

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

NEW YORK—The ADVERTISING AGE Flash Report of newspaper advertising investments showed December was a better month for the 29 measured major-market dailies than for the industry as a whole. Advertisers in 16 major categories increased spending 17.3% compared with December, 1984, levels, to $398.1 million.

Department stores led the way in dollar volume with a 19.7% increase to $145.7 million; but general-merchandise stores followed closely with a 25.7% increase to $71.9 million.

Food stores spending was up 17.3% to $32.7 million, and radio-tv-records dealers were up 33.3% to $34.1 million.

One national classification, new passenger cars, soared 52.3% to $16.9 million, and a pair of financial categories, banks and trust companies and stock, bond and investment houses, were up 40% to $6.1 million and up 39.4% to $1.7 million, respectively.

Losing categories included alcoholic beverages, down 7.3% to $5 million; computers, equipment and services, down 27.6% to $6.5 million; public service utilities and commissions, down 36.3% to $6.7 million, and publishing and media, down 0.2% to $9.9 million.

The Flash Report is based on measurements of advertising in 16 categories in 29 daily and 23 Sunday newspapers in 15 major markets.#

Pet faces hot fight in Italian-foods market

By JULIE FRANZ

Fresh from success in the Mexican specialty foods market, Pet Inc. will find the sauce even spicier when it squares off against established competitors in the fast-growing, $1.8 billion Italian-foods market.

St. Louis-based Pet, a unit of I.C. Industries, will start testing a 30-item line of Italian food (AA, March 3) under the Italian Market banner in June in Kansas City and Omaha.

It will be dishing up its new products on a table already set with places for Chesebrough-Pond's, Campbell Soup, Prince, Hershey, Borden's and R.T. French—and where elbows are flying. The Italian category grew 9% in sales last year.

Pet plans to field entries in most segments of the category, with retail prices ranging from 99¢ to $2.59. A company spokesman declined to match prices to specific items, but retail sources said items will be priced comparably with other premium Italian products.

Pet's Italian Market line includes 10 different dry pasta items (such as nested spinach fettuccini and angel hair pasta), 14 canned and bottled sauces (including Alfredo, Pesto and Marscala) and six "menu completers," including two antipasti salads and two Italian-style, shelf-stable custard dessert items.

Frozen entrees could be added, said grocery group president James Matson, although no frozen items initially are planned. The $673 million Italian frozen entree market grew 14% last year.

The Italian Market line will receive spot tv, magazine, newspaper and coupon support beginning in mid-June via Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Minneapolis. Mr. Matson said he expects the products to test for at least six months before moving national.

Competition could be keenest in the $847 million sauce market, which grew 9% last year, thanks to an already intense battle between Chesebrough-Pond's Ragu spaghetti sauce and Campbell Soup's Prego spaghetti sauce. Ragu holds a 49.4% market share, Prego 30.1%, and Prince's two brands, Aunt Millie's and Prince, hold a combined 6% share.

Campbell Soup will stir the segment even more in July by beginning national distribution of its Fresh Chef Italian Sauces line of jarred, refrigerated spaghetti sauces. The line includes Alfredo, White Clam, Bolognese and Classic Tomato flavors and could include Pesto and Red Clam varieties by yearend.

Campbell began testing in Buffalo and Rochester, N.Y., last April and moved into Denver, Philadelphia and St. Louis in January (AA, Feb. 10).

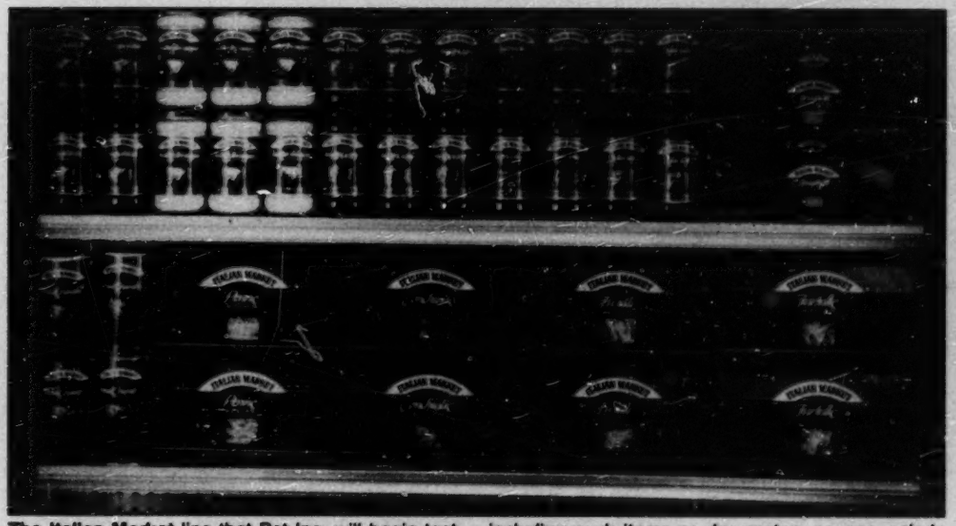
Campbell's product addresses the emergence of more elegant Italian food popularized in restaurants, said Marty Buchalski, Fresh Chef product manager. "Basic [spaghetti] sauces sell better with large families. We're using specialized sauces to get at smaller households," he said.

Spot tv, radio and coupons, via Needham Harper Worldwide, New York, support.

The Fresh Chef refrigerated brand also includes a line of salads, among them an Italian pasta salad and a line of soups in a jar.

Prince Co., Lowell, Mass., in February began testing a three-item line of Classico Pasta Sauces, based on three regions in Italy, in Albany, N.Y. The sauces are packaged in mason jars and retail for $1.69 (14 ozs.) and $2.99 (26 ozs.).

Prince also has begun testing a six-item line of President's Silver Award dry pasta (AA, Feb. 24) in varieties targeted to consumers with more exotic tastes, the company said. Testing is in New England, New York, Chicago and Detroit, with national distribution planned for July. Print in gourmet magazines, via Venet Advertising, New York, supports, although tv may be added to the media mix in September.



The Italian Market line that Pet Inc. will begin test-marketing in June encompasses 30 different items, including such items as dry pastas, sauces, salads and desserts.

The $852 million dry pasta market grew only 3% last year and is mostly made up of regional brands. The closely competitive market is led by Hershey Foods Corp. with a 17% market share for its six brands. In the No. 2 spot is CPC International's Mueller brand with a 15.6% share, but Borden's five brands are closing in, boosting their share last year to 15% from 11.9%.

Rochester, N.Y.-based R.T. French Co. is adding a twist by introducing a line of dry toppings for pasta and salads. French's Pasta Toss combines grated cheese, other dairy products, herbs and spices (AA, March 17).

French pioneered the market for sauce mixes in an envelope 30 years ago. Pasta Toss is an extension of that concept, but it stands alone rather than acts as a food additive. The four-flavor line is packaged in a cardboard shaker-bottle, like grated Parmesan cheese toppings, and retails for $1.59 per 3-oz. bottle. Each bottle contains 12 to 16 servings.

Network tv for Pasta Toss begins in June and runs through December. Magazine ads and couponed, freestanding newspaper inserts, via J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, also are part of the $10 million rollout.

By entering the Italian market, Pet is attempting to duplicate its success in the $1 billion Mexican food market, where its Old El Paso brand holds a 20% market share.

IC Industries' chairman William Johnson told a group of industry analysts in February it is looking for new products and acquisitions that would "strengthen Pet as a specialty food marketer." The company's 80-item Old El Paso line will move into international markets this year, including Europe and the far East, he said.

Pet has been testing a line of Old El Paso frozen entrees called Festive Dinners in regional markets since last spring (AA, May 20). Spot tv and couponing, themed "A great new change of place," via Grey Advertising, New York, support.#

Nets on Nielsen's case 1
A.C. Nielsen Co., under pressure from the Big 3 tv networks, is considering reversing its decision to drop diaries this September in favor of the electronic people meter. Nielsen will present to all three networks the cost of running the diaries for another year, and if the networks pick up the tab, Nielsen will publish both diary and people meter results for the 1986-87 broadcast year.

Xerox clash led to Needham exit 1
A collision of cultures between Xerox Corp.'s corporate and products advertising groups apparently left its marketing in a stalemate that could only be resolved by dismissing Needham Harper Worldwide and starting fresh.

A public occurrence 3
Public ownership of ad agencies will take a new twist when Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos comes to the market. HHCC would be the first regional agency to sell stock publicly.

Whittle, Moffitt split 3
The decision by Chris Whittle and Phillip Moffitt to split ownership of 13-30 Group and Esquire Magazine Group ends a partnership of nearly two decades, during which they built a student magazine into a $115 million empire.

Kurnit the advocate 6
After deciding the "most meaningful" thing he has done in his long advertising career was a public service campaign for high blood pressure that helped reduce strokes among black women, Shep Kurnit will leave the general agency business to concentrate on advocacy.

Holding on to Huggies 12
Kimberly-Clark Corp. continues searching for new products that can lessen the company's financial dependence on its successful Huggies line while trading on the Huggies name.

Rating the agencies' tv picks 24
It was as tough for ad agency experts to predict how viewers would respond to the new-for-fall 1985-86 prime time series as it is for handicappers to pick winners at the racetrack. But now that the winners are apparent, it can be seen that some pickers did well, and some didn't.

Champale branches out 34
Champale malt liquor is expanding beyond its working-class base with a slick, $3.5 million ad campaign breaking April 7 featuring a stable of sophisticated "party animals." The campaign, the first since Champale Inc. moved its account to North Castle Partners, attempts to grab more of the upscale 21-to-34-year-old segment.

CATEGORY REVIEW: FROZEN BREAKFASTS

Hottest breakfasts are found in freezer

Food marketers fight fast-food

By JULIE FRANZ

Rather than allow fast-food chains to take over the breakfast market, frozen food marketers are making the breakfast entree category one of the fastest-growing sections of grocers' freezers.

Sales of frozen breakfast entrees have skyrocketed during the last five years, up 154.6% to $103.1 million in 1985 compared with 1980, according to Time Inc.'s Selling Areas-Marketing Inc. Total frozen breakfast-food sales, including entrees, french toast, pancakes and waffles, rose to $339.2 million last year, up 93% from 1980.

Last year alone, frozen breakfast-entree sales rose 29%, while the total category grew 18%. Frozen breakfast entrees, french toast and pancakes and toaster items have led the list of hot breakfast categories, while frozen quiche and pancake batter and frozen pastry item sales are down, according to SAMI.

ConAgra Frozen Food Cos. and I.C. Industries' Pet Inc. are test-marketing entries in the category and others are expected to join, if only to keep Campbell Soup from building an insurmountable lead. Sales of Camden, N.J.-based Campbell's Great Starts frozen breakfasts—marketed under its Swanson's name—rose 18% last year to $50 million, giving the brand nearly a 50% share of the frozen breakfast-entree market and a 33% share of the total frozen breakfast category. (Great Starts tonnage sales grew 107% from August, 1981, to July, 1985, the company says.)

Campbell had frozen breakfast entrees in some form for almost 15 years before repositioning the line in 1984 and branding it with the Great Starts name. The brand now has two lines: Full entrees and breakfast sandwiches.

The entrees cover the traditional breakfast foods, including pancakes and sausage, french toast and sausage and scrambled eggs with potatoes and sausage. The line has been getting advertising support in general ads for Swanson frozen foods, but will receive its own spot tv and print promotion this year, said Archie van Beuren, Great Starts' marketing manager. The line is priced in the $1.19-to-$1.29 range.

The four-item breakfast sandwich line will move into national distribution this year from regional distribution in the Central states, Mr. van Beuren said. The line includes two English muffin-based products and two biscuit-based products. Ogilvy & Mather, New York, handles the Great Starts brand.

Campbell already is seeing competition from ConAgra, which is testing Banquet Cafe Classics, and Pet Inc.'s test of Downyflake Breakfast Classics. Mr. van Beuren says he expects others to join. Food marketers "look for the big-growth categories from SAMI and then run into each other getting into the market," he said.

Chicago-based Quaker Oats is a logical competitor with its Aunt Jemima frozen products, Mr. van Beuren said. R.J. Reynolds Indus-

Media-buying agency seeks to expand role

CPM acquires researcher

By VERNE GAY

CPM, a $140 million Chicago-based media-buying agency, is acquiring the Media Connection, a New York market research boutique, to become a full-service marketing/media company.

The move is unusual and risky. Media-buying agencies traditionally have taken a back-seat role in their clients' marketing plans, instead preferring to concentrate on media planning and buying.

The risk is CPM's intention to play a central role in developing its clients' over-all marketing and creative strategies. That would represent a direct challenge to its clients' agencies. CPM also has several agencies as clients.

"There are very few clients who have turned to us for media planning—they usually turn to their agencies," said CPM president Norman Goldring. "We're taking a proactive stance to become the marketing agency of record."

Agencies have failed to supply adequate marketing information to their clients, said Larry Silverman, formerly president of Media Connection and now exec vp-director of marketing for the merged entity. That's because agencies' profit structures are "dramatically opposed to efficient media buying," he contended.

As a result, agencies produce media plans without insight into a product's marketing needs, he argued. CPM's strategy is to develop a client's marketing plan "that buys against competitors and potential buyers rather than just against 'body counts,'" and ultimately to have a role in developing the creative, Mr. Silverman said.

"Agencies haven't developed or funded enough marketing expertise," Mr. Silverman said. "Why? Because their business is based on their percentage fee. If a client had the choice of spending $50 or $50,000 on a creative storyboard, they'll spend $50,000 because they think that will get them the best."

CPM's move comes at a time when some other media-buying services are stepping up efforts to enhance their services, specifically marketing functions.

New York-based Vitt Media, for example, offers clients a "second-opinion" service that monitors marketing or media campaigns.

Western International Media Corp., Los Angeles, creates tv syndication ad vehicles for its clients.

CPM, which handles some of the media buying for Upjohn Co., Beecham Cosmetics, Walgreen Co. and General Electric Co.'s appliance division, is buying the Media Connection for about $1.8 million.

The small company, founded 4½ years ago by Mr. Silverman, a one-time agency executive, specializes in a research system that determines product use on a neighborhood basis in cities, relying heavily on the Prizm research system.

In a recent project for Canandaigua Wine Co.'s Sun Country Wine Coolers, MC determined wine cooler consumption habits based on life-style and geographic patterns. The creative campaign, by Towne, Silverstein, Rotter, New York, was ultimately based on the research.

Wine & Beer Marketing

Ted Gadecki

Drop in consumption a sour note for industries

By Len Strazewski

Consumption tells the tale and the story is not a happy one for wine and beer marketers.

Americans are drinking more soft drinks, 44.5 gals. per capita in 1985, up from 42.4 gals. in 1984, and more bottled water, 5.2 gals. per capita in 1985, up from 4.6 gals. in 1984, according to beverage industry analyst John C. Maxwell of Laidlaw Ansbacher in New York.

But they are drinking less beer, 23.8 gals. per capita in 1985 compared with 24.0 in 1984, and about the same amount of wine, 20.1 gals. in 1985 compared to 20.0 gals. in 1984.

And the wine and beer industries are spending more just to keep the consumers they have. Advertising expenditure figures for the first six months of 1985, compiled by Impact, an industry newsletter based in New York, show both wine and beer producers spending more than 17% ahead of the 1984 pace.

Beer advertisers led with about $269.5 million in the first half of 1985, up 17.9% from the similar period in 1984. Wine advertisers spent $67.3 million in the first half, up 17.5% from the similar period in 1984.

Of the two beverage categories, the wine industry seems to be in the better position. The total U.S. wine market, as measured in the sale of 9-liter cases, increased during the first half of 1985, to 113.2 million cases, up 3.6% from the similar period in 1984, according to Impact.

However, wine industry sources are not proud of the results. Most of the growth in the category was a result of the rapid growth of wine coolers, a fruit juice and wine blend. Excluding wine cooler sales, the total wine market shrunk 7%, to 96.8 million cases, in the first half of 1985, and excluding wine cooler advertising, total wine industry advertising fell 15.3%, to $46.8 million, for the first half of 1985.

The cooler market grew 216%, to 16.4 million cases in the first half of 1985 and though wine cooler production helped soak up excess U.S. wine, wine industry leaders do not believe the product reflects greater consumer interest in wine.

"When the smoke clears, even though wine coolers are using up a fair amount of wine, they are not really part of the wine market," says Jack Davies, chairman of the Wine Institute, San Francisco, and owner of Schramsberg Vineyards and Cellars, Calistoga, Cal. "Wine coolers are marketed like beer and, properly, they are more allied with the beer market."

Additional market research conducted by New York-based research company Oxtoby-Smith for the Wine Institute and released only to the California wine trade indicates that, excluding wine cooler drinkers and very occasional table wine drinkers, consumers are showing less interest in wine.

Only about 35% of the adult population drinks wine at least monthly and of that group, 43% are drinking less wine and only 26% are drinking more wine. Over a five-year period, however, frequency of consumption is up, but compared with last year, frequency of consumption is flat.

And, according to portions of the study read to Advertising Age, only a little more than half of the regular wine consumers say wine is their preferred alcoholic beverage, and 40% say wine is "not as special as it used to be."

The wine industry has few plans to fight slipping consumption, but some wine makers say steps must be taken to improve distribution. If more quality products reach consumers, they believe consumption will increase.

"We have got to start providing more support to our distribution system, and even though the net effect will be to raise the costs of production, it may be time for wineries to buy some national advertising," says Allen Hemphill, president of Chateau St. Jean Vineyards & Winery, Kenwood, Cal.

Chateau St. Jean plans to increase promotional spending and may unveil a national advertising campaign in 1987.

Though the beer industry reports similar consumption problems, the domestic brewing industry is still huge. U.S. brewers sold 180 million bbls. in 1985, or more than 5.6 billion gals. of beer.

And according to recently released sales statistics compiled by Impact for the top 10 beer brands, which account for 66.5% of the U.S. beer market, sales for 1985 rebounded over the previous year. Total sales of the top 10 was 121.9 million bbls., up 3.8% from 1984. St. Louis-based Anheuser-Busch led producers with substantial gains among three of its labels in the top 10 with its largest seller, Budweiser, up 3.8%, Busch up 18.5% and Bud Light the leading gainer with an increase of 31.7%.

Only three labels lost sales, an improvement over 1984, when six of the top 10 reported losses. The biggest loser was Miller High Life from Miller Brewing Co., Milwaukee, down 11.7%; Stroh's from Stroh Brewery Co., Detroit, down 5.7%, and A-B's Michelob, off 1.5%.

Two other beer market segments, imports and microbreweries, are both reporting substantial gains. Microbrewery production has nearly quadrupled from 27,000 bbls. in 1984 to 90,000 bbls. in 1985 and observers expect continued growth this year.

Brand statistics for imported beer in 1985 are not yet available, but according to "Beer Marketers Insights," a West Nyack, N.Y.-based brewing industry newsletter, the imported beer segment in 1985 showed a healthy 10% growth, to 245.4 million cases and 4% of U.S. beer sales. Heineken, imported by Van Munching & Co., New York, probably held its traditional rank as the nation's best selling import.

The fastest growing import, according to "Beer Marketers Insights," is Corona Extra, imported by Barton Brands, Chicago (see related story).

The brand battles continue with very few changes in marketing strategy to combat slipping consumption; however, major labels are increasing their commitments to sports promotion as well as their ad spending (see related story).

Beer marketers put most of their increased ad spending into tv, which was up 14.8%, to $240.3 million, in the first half of 1985, and network radio, which was up 32.8%, to $4.3 million. Beer marketers, however, reduced over-all outdoor advertising spending 23.2%, to $5.6 million for that period.

Exchange rate boosts imported wine prices in U.S.

By Claire Wilson

American wine lovers will find fewer French wine imports at slightly higher prices this year —thanks to a 30% drop in the exchange rate of the U.S. dollar.

Import prices had been low as the U.S. dollar hit an all-time high in early 1985. As a result, imported wine sales also hit new highs in 1984 and early 1985.

Imported wine accounted for 59.9 million cases in 1984, up 8.8% from 1983, and the category had 25.8% of the over-all wine market, according to New York-based Impact, an industry newsletter. Statistics for the first six months of 1985 indicate an almost equal shipment pace.

But the latest currency fluctuations are reversing this trend, industry sources say. As a result, French imported wine prices will be higher.

"The decline of the dollar will undoubtedly have a negative effect because the American market is so very price sensitive," says Philippe Heilbronner, chairman of RNSA, Paris, holding company for Nicolas, one of France's largest distributors of wines and spirits. Nicolas had $10 million in retail sales in the U.S. in 1985 from 300,000 cases shipped.

The import market in the U.S. will be even more competitive than it was in 1985, sources say. French wines will be competing with Italian wines for space on U.S. retail shelves. Also, California wines will grow more competitive with imports.

The currency fluctuations also may affect the French domestic market. Americans, industry sources say, will be able to afford to export. Wine coolers may even make an appearance in France.

Some trends, however, mitigate the impact of the price increases for French marketers.

The hardest hit segment of the market will be the lower price wines, whose profitability is based on volume. While these lower price French table wines have gained some market share in the U.S. in recent years, the majority of French wines imported to the U.S. are higher quality, higher price wines.

In 1985, the wholesale value of French table wines exported to the U.S. was $45 million, while exports of premium wines, not including Champagnes, were valued at $280 million, says Olivier Desforges, sales and marketing manager at Societe Des Vins De France (SVF) in Paris, the country's largest wine marketers. SVF has about 11% of the wine market in France, followed closely by Nicolas. SVF had U.S. retail sales of about $2.9 million in 1985 from 80,000 cases shipped.

American premium wine lovers are not likely to give up their fine French wines because of small price changes, he says.

Last year's releases were considered particularly good in quantity and quality, so producers increased prices, even before the sinking of the dollar. As a result, French wine producers appear only mildly concerned about slackening U.S. wine sales; however, they are concerned about a shift in wine consumption.

U.S. over-all wine consumption, excluding booming wine coolers, is down, and consumption in traditional wine countries, such as France and Italy, is also down. However, countries not traditionally strong wine consumers, such as the U.K. and Japan, are increasing consumption.

If French wine producers want any growth in the U.S. in 1986, they had better expand brand marketing and advertising, Mr. Desforges says.

French producers have benefited from the strong dollar through opportunity selling and have not established firm positions in the market, he says. Few French wines have any kind of strong brand identity that will keep them selling with consumers despite seesawing prices.

In general, wine marketers are small companies or chateaus with no money for advertising, he says.

The situation is not likely to change soon and SVF only recently has begun to market its brands in France. The company, acquired by spirits marketer Pernod Richard last year, plans to concentrate on export marketing eventually.

Mexican brews the hot category in imports

By Patricia Winters

In 1979, when John Travolta was a box-office smash and disco was king, Chicago-based Barton Brands received the assignment of importing to the U.S. a popular Mexican beer called Corona Extra brewed by Cerveceria Modelo S.A.

> All Brands

Barton revamped Corona's dusty, surrealistic image to a sleeker, more upscale look. A brown bottle with gold foil label replaced the long-necked clear bottle with blue painted label. But after two years in the market, the product failed.

"We had virtually no success at all," says Ellis Goodman, Barton Brands president and chief executive officer.

So Barton returned to the original look and image of Corona for a test in Texas in 1981, when the western look was sweeping the country. The brand started to catch on. Today, the entire Mexican import category is skyrocketing.

Corona is the fastest growing imported beer in the U.S. and the No. 1 Mexican imported beer, even though it is is not yet distributed along the East Coast. Last year, Corona moved from eighth to fifth on the top 10 best selling imported beer list, surpassing longtime Mexican import leader Dos Equis, brewed by Cerveceria Moctezuma S.A. Sales of Corona jumped from 1.7 million cases in 1984, to 5.2 million cases last year, according to "Beer Marketers Insights," an industry newsletter based in West Nyack, N.Y. The brand has surpassed imported beer king Heineker, brewed by Heineken Brouwerijen B.V. and imported by Van Munching Co., New York, as the most popular import in Texas and is coming close to toppling other brands in Southern California.

"I've been in this business for 25 years, and I've never seen anything like it," Mr. Goodman says.

With little advertising, and in some cases only regional distribution, the Mexican import segment is booming. While the imported beer segment in 1985 showed a healthy 10% growth to 245.4 million cases, about 4% of the total beer market, Mexican imports grew 67% to 11.3 million cases, according to "Beer Marketing Insights."

While much of that growth can be attributed to Corona, marketers of Corona's chief Mexican competitors—Dos Equis and Tecate, brewed by Cerveceria Cuauhtemoc S.A. — also report sales increases.

"It's just one of those crazy things that no one really understands," says Benjamin Steinman, "Beer Marketing Insights" executive editor. "And the trend doesn't seem to have peaked."

The trend is blazing eastward. All Brand Importers, New York, which imports Dos Equis, Superior and Noche Buena east of the Mississippi (Moctezuma Imports handles brands west of the Mississippi), says 1985 was its best year for the brands.

Increased travel to Mexico has helped build awareness. Many who sample beer such as Corona or Dos Equis while traveling in Mexico continue to drink the brands at home, importers say, and Mexico's close proximity to the U.S. doesn't hurt.

"In the imported beer field, it's a great advantage to be close to the main markets in the United States," says Paul Lohmeyer, All Brands president. "I think there's also a growing awareness about how good Mexican beer is, and there's quite an interest in Mexican food and spicy food in general."

With all the elements working in favor of the Mexican segment, marketers have decided now is the time to beef up advertising and promotion. Barton Brands expects to spend $3 million to support Corona, while chief competitors Wisdom Import Sales Co., marketer of Tecate, and Moctezuma Imports, marketer of Dos Equis, both located in Irvine, Cal., intend to spend about $4 million to back their Mexican brands.

Both Wisdom and Moctezuma are hoping to capitalize on Corona's success with similarly positioned brands.

ico's Number One beer" via Dawson, Johns & Black, Chicago.

Last year's campaign, using the same theme, was pulled soon after launch because demand for the beer was exceeding supply. Barton now says its supply situation is under control, and it is slowly moving the brand eastward toward national distribution. Barton now sells Corona in about 22 states west of the Mississippi and will move into some East Coast markets this year. Barton expects sales of about 7.5 million to 8 million cases in 1986.

Barton will continue to focus on its key 21-to-34-year-old consumer segment. Last year Barton signed singer-songwriter Jimmy Buffet as spokesman and sponsored his nationwide tour. This year's radio spots will feature an original Buffet song for Corona.

"Our strategy is to position Corona as being what Mexico is all about," says Michael Mazzoni, Barton exec vp and general manager. "We are associating Corona with the best things in Mexico."

While sales of all Mexican brands were up last year, some industry observers believe Dos Equis sales in the West were hurt by Corona. Perhaps as a result, Moctezuma has developed its own dual strategy for growth. The company is broadening the target audience for Dos Equis, the nation's second best selling Mexican beer, while at the same time taking a rifle-shot approach for its new import, Hussong's Cerveza Clara, which is positioned directly at Corona.

> "Our feeling this year is to go for a younger base . . . . We want to bring new, entry-level beer consumers into the fold."

> Moctezuma

The strategy is backed by new creative developed by Moctezuma's new agency, Grey Advertising, Los Angeles.

"The industry is so competitive, we felt it was time for a new creative thrust for Dos Equis," says Martin Johnson, Moctezuma marketing director. Dos Equis will focus more on radio and outdoor than on print advertising, he says. Dos Equis strategy is to set itself apart from all other Mexican beers. enough to go for a broader, more-lasting consumer base, Mr. Johnson says.

In 1984, the latest published comparable statistics available, Dos Equis was listed as the nation's seventh largest selling imported beer with sales of 2.4 million cases.

Dos Equis already has a strong consumer base among the 25-to-49-year-old segment and will now target minimum age drinkers.

"Our feeling this year is to go for a younger base while still supporting our loyal base," Mr. Johnson says. "We want to bring new, entry-level beer consumers into the fold."

Radio spots that broke in March feature the theme "Drink for Taste, Not Trends." In the spot, a man who has been out of the singles scene for several years goes to a bar to order a Dos Equis.

"In the late 1970s, Dos Equis had its Corona run; it was the trendy beer," Mr. Johnson says. "But it's above the trend now."

Hussong's, which Moctezuma introduced in Southern California in September, was backed by spots with the slogan "We imported the fun, not the federales."

However, the spots were cancelled after complaints from consumers and Mexican radio stations.

The spots featured a comical pair of Mexican police who fear distribution of Hussong's north of the border will cost them their jobs.

Mr. Johnson says the beer, which is aimed at minimum age drinkers, has done particularly well in Southern California and and several other western states.

The brand is now available in 14 states with Denver, Colo., the easternmost market. "Its popularity will spread north and then east; that's how Corona did it," he says.

Wisdom also will do battle with new advertising for Tecate, its flagship brand, and Bohemia, via its new agency Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Los Angeles. Howlett-Berner & Associates, Newport Beach, Cal., former agency on these brands, will continue to handle Wisdom's Carta Blanca.

Mark Theise, Wisdom marketing services director, says radio and outdoor advertising for both Tecate and Bohemia will break in May to coincide with the Spanish holiday Cinco de Mayo.

Moctezuma is taking a new tack with Dos Equis, setting the mature import apart from all other Mexican beers.

Tecate, which is sold in a can, appeals to the minimum age drinker, as well as to a strong Hispanic base. The brand is supposed to be consumed with salt and lime, and this will be emphasized in advertising, Mr. Theise says.

Tecate was the 10th best selling imported beer in 1984 with sales of 1.6 million cases, according to Market Watch, New York, an industry trade magazine.

Wisdom, which did not disclose more recent figures, reports sales of all its Mexican brands showed an increase of 27% in 1985.

Wisdom's Bohemia is positioned against Dos Equis' 25-to-49-year-old consumer base. A heavier tasting beer, the brand will be positioned as "the Heineken of Mexican beer," Mr. Theise says.

In its effort to grab a greater share of Corona's sales success, the company is marketing Chihuahua, a clear-bottled brew with colorful packaging and a label with a train on it.

While Chihuahua receives only promotional support, Mr. Theise says the imported brand has done well among younger consumers.

Whether the popularity of Mexican beer is a fad or a long-term trend is anyone's guess. But with sales mounting, marketers say they aren't going to sit around.

"The Mexican category is growing by leaps and bounds, but there's so much competition in imports right now, it's hard to say what will happen," Mr. Theise says.

"But we anticipate it growing for at least another five years."

Wanted: One international creative chief

By JOHN O'TOOLE

"I want to be an international creative director," the student said to me. "What do I have to do?"

The question was so bizarre that I was unable to come up with an adequate answer at the time or for weeks after. Does such a job exist? If not, should it?

Those two questions are somewhat easier than the student's. I don't think there is such a thing as an international creative director at present. What Barry Day does at McCann-Erickson comes close, but it seems more troubleshooting than creative directing.

Should there be such a function? I can think of at least three reasons why there should be.

First, it would provide a competitive advantage to those agencies that will emerge as the global giants of the '90s. Volume growth, geographic dispersion and merging are draining them all of any creative distinction they might have garnered in early years.

The contending colossi, whatever their number, should offer advertisers some kind of choice; each should distinguish itself by means of a creative point of view. Unless they enjoy the presence of a founder who, like David Ogilvy, will nag some creative consistency into a far-flung collection of offices, they will need international creative directors.

Second, multinational and global advertisers would benefit from such professionals in the agencies they hire to apply global leverage to effective advertising ideas. An international creative director is more likely to get an imported idea tried than is an international account director, and the international creative director is more qualified to make judgments about executional alterations suggested for cultural compatibility.

Third, there would be a benefit for national clients, too. An international creative director could add substantially to the creative firepower in a local office. Coming from a major advertising market such as the U.S. or the U.K., he or she might contribute a dimension of experience and talent unavailable or unaffordable locally.

With so many advantages accruing, one might expect to see international creative directors popping up in all the big agencies.

But the trouble is the job borders on the impossible. Furthermore, the qualities it would require are found in very few.

Directing creative operations in more than one office of a single country is demanding enough. The cultural and transportational and communicational complexities of multinational work multiply those demands geometrically.

A candidate for such a job would have to bring, in addition to an extraordinary memory for names, faces, numbers, campaigns and exchange rates, a creative reputation that commands attention.

Leadership is a given, but it must be of the variety that wins loyalty and compliance by being confident, firm and better than anyone else's. It must be seen as help rather than interference.

Since the international creative director will be absent most of the time, he or she must be able to influence local creative decisions without impairing the ability of local creative directors to find brilliant solutions on their own.

The candidate's formal education would most likely be liberal arts. If a fascination with mankind's history and cultures and thought didn't precede a fascination with business and advertising, it's probably too late.

The kinds of conversations that spin out into the night in foreign cities are unlike those heard on Madison or Michigan Avenues. One's contributions to those conversations, one's demonstrated interest, can be the difference between success and failure.

For similar reasons, the candidate must have a working knowledge of the languages spoken in the most important offices. Even though most of the people in those offices speak English, ability in their languages is minimum evidence of a commitment to understanding their countrymen and their cultures.

Besides, the advertising is done in the local tongue, and no one has a right to comment on, much less direct, headlines or copy or broadcast dialog he doesn't understand.

Finally, the candidate must possess remarkable physical stamina. Overseas flights are exhausting, and a country-per-day schedule soon saps the vigor of the heartiest.

I would like to think such people exist. Without them, the creative focus in major agencies will continue to be local and no one—neither client nor agency nor consumer nor the industry—will reap any creative reward from all the bigness and globalness.

I would also like to think that the student who asked me the question that started all this turns out to be one of those people.

Y&R gunning for Ford in the U.K.

By LAUREL WENTZ

London—Young & Rubicam is believed to be targeting the $30 million Ford U.K. account, now with Ogilvy & Mather, following its gain of the $40 million Ford account from J. Walter Thompson Co. in Germany (AA, March 24).

But Y&R's goal may be more difficult to achieve than the agency believes.

Those who think Y&R has a good chance to get the U.K. account pointed to Ford's up-and-down market share in the U.K.

"Ford hasn't been doing as well as they've done in the past in the U.K.," said Nick Mustoe, manager of the General Motors Corp. account at Lowe Marschalk Worldwide here. "They're doing a lot more discounting to buy market share—it looks like distress marketing."

Ford still is the U.K. market leader, with a 26.1% market share in January and February, but GM's U.K. subsidiary, Vauxhall Motors, has climbed steadily within striking distance, to 18.1%.

Other sources said Y&R's chances are slim. A Ford source in Detroit said the company is satisfied with O&M's work in the U.K., particularly with a new campaign that will break this year.

Also, Ford's U.K. subsidiary cherishes its right to appoint its own agency locally and is loyal to O&M, Ford's agency here since 1975, sources said.

In any battle for Ford's account, Y&R's U.K. chairman, John Banks, should emerge as a key figure.

Two-and-a-half years ago, Mr. Banks was the management supervisor for the Ford account at O&M. Many believe he was hired away by Y&R during an earlier attempt to woo Ford in the U.K., but Y&R executives denied it.

"Y&R had high hopes at the time that the combination of Y&R's high standing in the U.S. for its work on Lincoln-Mercury, and the acquisition of John Banks with his Ford U.K. experience would land them the business," said a source here close to Y&R.

"There were some presentations, but essentially the European bosses of Ford were more interested in Y&R than the Ford U.K. people were.

"He [Mr. Banks] went into the presentation, and Ford's U.K. management thought very poorly of the guy who had been telling them O&M's work was best, standing up wearing a Y&R hat," said the same source. "The reaction was 'Over our dead bodies' will Y&R ever get the Ford business as long as Mr. Banks is involved."

Mr. Banks denied that he was working for Y&R here to get the Ford U.K. account, and said, "I joined Y&R Europe as head of client service. . .and that's what I did for nine months."

Other sources agreed that in a showdown the outcome could depend on the relative strengths and influences of a local pro-O&M faction and a pro-Y&R faction at the European or international level.

"Ford in Britain has always been run very autonomously, more than any of the other Ford of Europe subsidiaries," said a competing adman. "I think part of that independence is keeping their own ad agency. The problem Y&R has is that it's an international Ford agency."

Which agency ends up with the account, he said, "depends on which factions are in the ascendancy."

Canadian radio spots may grow

By DAN REMINGTON

Montreal—Canadians could be hearing a lot more radio spots if new proposals from the Canadian Radio-Television & Telecommunications Commission are adopted.

Under the new rules, all restrictions on advertising time on am radio and restrictions on the number of ads allowed per hour on fm stations would be eliminated for a two-year trial period.

In addition, beer, wine and spirits advertisers would no longer be forced to clear scripts for commercials with the CRTC before they are aired. However, regulations forbidding alcohol producers from promoting drinking would remain.

The proposals are "part of the commission's long-standing efforts to lighten the regulatory burden and place a greater emphasis on a supervisory rather than a regulatory role," said CRTC chairman Andre Bureau, chairman of the CRTC, which is Canada's version of the Federal Communications Commission in the U.S. "The commission expects the radio industry to adopt its own guidelines."

A rule forcing am stations to devote 30% of airtime to Canadian content remains, but only 7% Canadian content would be required on ethnic stations.

The commission is inviting comment on the proposals and will make a final decision after May 1.

But while the CRTC is considering opening up the radio airwaves, it is also looking into restricting certain tv ads.

The agency is now awaiting the results of a consumers' poll on whether celebrities should be prohibited from appearing in alcoholic-beverage commercials in Quebec (AA, Feb. 17).

Brewers in Quebec favor a voluntary code of ethics for such advertising rather than new, government-imposed regulations.

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches)
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches

Century 21 campaign homes in on No. 1

By BRIAN LOWRY

IRVINE, CAL.—Century 21 Real Estate Corp. is committing a third of its annual $25 million network tv budget to a new second-quarter campaign reasserting its No. 1 status in the single-family segment.

The real estate network is spending more money than ever before to undercut the advertising claims of competitors, such as Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s Coldwell, Banker Real Estate Group, Los Angeles, and ERA Real Estate, Shawnee, Kan., that they occupy the top spot.

Those claims involve "distorting figures," charged Century 21 senior vp-marketing Bruce Oseland.

For example, Coldwell, Banker is the nation's No. 1 corporate real estate agent, though its share of the single-family dwellings segment is estimated at 5.6%.

Century 21 claims it has an 11.4% share of the single-family segment —more than twice that of any competitor.

Single-family homes are estimated to represent 56% of the entire $25 billion residential and commercial real estate market.

The No. 1 label is a vital part of Century 21's marketing strength, Mr. Oseland said. "All our research tells us that most people like to do business with a real estate company that is already the most successful in the area," he said.

The three new 30-second spots, airing tonight on CBS-TV's "Newhart" and "Cagney & Lacey," continue the company's 2-year-old "Put No. 1 to work for you" theme.

"Who sells more homes than anyone else?" a blues-style singer asks in the campaign's centerpiece ad. The commercial uses images of a wide spectrum of homes that Century 21 sells.

"We think this spot will clear up any consumer confusion generated by our competition," said Martha Barrett, director-advertising.

Another spot, entitled "Power to move," shows a legion of gold-coated Century 21 agents surrounding a home, accompanied by a musical score, literally hoisting the home off the ground. "No one's got the power to move real estate like Century 21," actor James Coburn says in the voiceover.

"Power to move" doesn't use the "Put No. 1 to work" line because it also will air in foreign markets where the company isn't No. 1. Century 21 is already in Japan, France and Canada and will enter Australia for the first time this year, Mr. Oseland said.

The final spot continues the "agent as hero" format of previous campaigns.

Metropolitan Life Insurance, New York, acquired Century 21 last year (AA, Aug. 26). McCann-Erickson, Los Angeles, handles the account, in concert with McCann executive creative director John Bergin in New York.

Century 21 tv ads boast of its agents' "power to move" homes.

The account team includes Dennis Foley, executive creative director; Terri Krausse, art director; Deborah Sirulnik, associate creative director-copywriter; Kim Carlson, account supervisor, and Jim Foley, vp-management supervisor. Directors included Haskell Wexler, Richard Loncraine and Ron Lieberman.#

by July 1.

In a joint interview last week, both men stressed their parting was amicable.

"To say we've never said a harsh word would be a joke," Mr. Whittle said, "because people have heard us shouting through doors. People change, times change, companies change. It's best to recognize that and move on."

Added Mr. Moffitt, who continues as EMG's president, ceo and editor-in-chief: "There's some point, if you're an entrepreneur, you just go build on your own ...Now we can each set our own priorities and choose challenges significant to us as individuals."

P. Moffitt C. Whittle

After meeting at the University of Tennessee, the two men and some friends began publishing Nutshell, an annual magazine distributed free to college students, in fall, 1969. The next year, they and a larger group formed 13-30 Corp., so named because its media projects would appeal to those in that age range.

In May, 1979, by which time 13-30 had become profitable and entered other special markets, Messrs. Whittle and Moffitt took a gigantic step up in class by buying, with ANH's help, Esquire.

During the four-plus years it took them to move Esquire back into the black, many members of the marketing and media communities here derided the efforts of what they termed "the boys."

But they soon earned respect, not to mention ad dollars, as they simultaneously expanded 13-30's and Esquire's operations.

The former company expanded its presence in the educational market and entered the business, health and entertainment fields.

The latter made entries into book publishing, poster centers and video.

Along the way, of course, there have been miscues, including abortive efforts in film and tv, and overambitious growth estimates, such as a 1983 projection of $200 million-to-$250 million in revenues by '87 to '88.

After the splitup, Messrs. Whittle and Moffitt said, each intends to focus on fields he is already in, not competing directly with the other.

EMG will be "launching a series of magazines in the next few years," said Mr. Moffitt. Word is due later this month on the first, believed to be New York Woman, the initial title in what sources say is a planned network of regional women's magazines.

Whittle Communications will "continue in the specialized media field," said Mr. Whittle, "launching four to six new vehicles a year," as well as entering related areas.

Following are the financial details of the restructuring:

Mr. Moffitt, ANH and EMG will acquire Mr. Whittle's interests and rights in EMG, save for a small share, for about $10 million. Mr. Moffitt, EMG's largest shareholder, will become controlling shareholder. ANH will hold the second largest block of shares, followed by EMG's top management, such as Alan Greenberg, exec vp-group publisher, and original 13-30 investors. Mr. Whittle will resign his operating duties, but continue as chairman until 1988.

Mr. Whittle and ANH will acquire Mr. Moffitt's interests in 13-30, as well as those of the company's 29 other investors, for $30 million in cash and notes. At that time, 13-30 will be converted from a corporation to a limited partnership called Whittle Communications, in which Mr. Whittle and ANH will be general partners, with the former controlling operations, and about 30 top executives, such as president-ceo Nicholas Glover, as limited partners. Mr. Moffitt will resign his operating duties, but will retain the title of co-founder until 1988 and will buy a limited partnership in Whittle Communications.#

Breakfast

tries, Winston-Salem, N.C., may dabble in the category through its Morton frozen-food brand, Pet Inc. group president Raymond Felitto said.

He said Minneapolis-based Pillsbury could enter the market through its Green Giant brand and that H.J. Heinz Co., Pittsburgh, could enter through its Weight Watchers brand.

ConAgra's Frozen Food Co. is testing Banquet Cafe Classics, a premium-price line of omelet-based entrees. In so doing, ConAgra is taking a gamble, industry sources say. Campbell Soup's Mr. van Beuren allows that the frozen omelet is the slowest seller in the Great Start line, because, he says, people "don't realize what excellent quality you can get from a frozen egg."

ConAgra Frozen believes its omelets will overcome any similar resistance because they have "flair," said Nick Rago, president of ConAgra Frozen Food Cos., St. Louis. Cafe Classics give consumers "the opportunity to have a unique breakfast in six to ten minutes in the microwave," Mr. Rago said, and are "unique" enough to make a good meal any time of day.

The Cafe Classics line includes items such as San Francisco Crepes filled with spinach, cheese and sausage, Crepes Manhattan filled with ham and cheese and served with escalloped apples and a Crabmeat Omelet. The entrees retail for between $2.79 and $3.

Cafe Classics began selling into grocery stores in January in six test markets: Albany, Boston, Dallas, Denver, Florida and Hartford. Its $22.5 million (nationally projected) media schedule kicked off Jan. 27 with tv spots themed "Seven light meals for people who eat anytime they can find time." Fallon McElligott Rice, Minneapolis, handles.

St. Louis-based Pet Inc.'s entry capitalizes on its Downyflake name, which has the largest share of the frozen waffle category, a leadership position that prompted it to enter with its own frozen breakfast entree. The company calls its entry "a defensive measure so other frozen breakfast-entree entries don't take our waffle share away and an offensive measure to grab additional business," Mr. Felitto said.

Downyflake Breakfast Classics this month began selling into grocery stores in Milwaukee and two other unnamed markets. The five-item line is priced in the $1.35-to-$1.50 range between Swanson Great Starts and Banquet Cafe Classics.

The product will receive spot tv and couponed freestanding newspaper insert support via Grey Advertising, New York.

Fast-food chains played a major role in making the public aware of breakfast again by pumping dollars into breakfast advertising, said Campbell Soup's Mr. van Beuren. Fast-food chains "took the general awareness of breakfast and put some punch behind it."

Chains such as Burger King and McDonald's Corp. have begun strengthening their breakfast menus with new products and bolstering their ad budgets accordingly (AA, Feb. 24). Breakfast already accounts for 20% of McDonald's sales while Burger King told a group of industry analysts in February it's aiming at breakfast being 10% of sales, up from 6% to 7% now.

In the $120 billion restaurant industry, breakfast sales were up 7.4% last year while industrywide sales rose only 3.1%, according to the National Restaurant Assn.

"Restaurants are usually the precursors of what's happening in the supermarket," said Pet Inc.'s Mr. Felitto. Restaurant trends also heighten grocery retail buyers' interest in new-food categories, which can be good when shelf space is tight, he added.

The rise of the dual-income household and increased microwave penetration have created a "positive environment for convenient, frozen breakfasts," he added.

The frozen breakfast-entree category could see "a 100%-to-200% upside before it flattens out," Mr. van Beuren predicted. "As people become more and more aware of being able to get a good, tasty breakfast from a microwave oven, sales will multiply."

Making people aware of the improved quality of frozen breakfasts is the big issue. As more players enter the market, and thus more ad dollars are spent, the problem will solve itself, Mr. van Beuren added.

Quality is another factor that could make or break the category, Pet Inc.'s Mr. Felitto said. If frozen food makers can match or surpass the quality of a fast-food breakfast, the category could hit $400 million in five years, he said.

Lucrily the demographics of a fast-food breakfast eater and a frozen breakfast-entree eater are different enough to provide real growth opportunities for the frozen segment, Mr. Felitto said. Fast-food is oriented more toward adolescents, teens and young adults as a "treat experience" while frozen breakfasts are aimed at the 24-to-49-year-old "upscale yuppie" audience—a group that is less likely to eat fast-food.#

Pressure to accept 15s 1
The 15-second ad unit is expected to represent 30% of 1986-87 upfront prime time tv network buys, and several major agencies are pressuring ABC-TV and NBC-TV to reverse their policies against accepting stand-alone 15s.

Westport promo shop shutters 1
A subsidiary of Westport Marketing Cos., the company that until June, 1984, handled sales promotion for the private Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation, has filed involuntary Chapter 7 bankruptcy. The move leaves an ad agency and several media companies with what appear to be uncollectable debts.

P&G hoists sheets 3
Procter & Gamble has taken the lead in laundry-detergent technology with its test-marketing of new Tide Multi-Action Sheets, which combine detergent, whiteners and fabric softener in a single sheet.

Frito-Lay's snack attack 4
Frito-Lay's flurry of new products bursts onto network tv today with the triple national launch of three new snack items. And that's not all. Frito's marketing activity includes new potato chips, cookies and a new approach to selling cheese snacks.

Black & Decker irons out ads 6
Black & Decker Corp. is pressing ahead in its battle to defend the hefty market share it inherited with the 1984 purchase of General Electric's housewares division by breaking a tv spot this week for its new top-of-the-line irons.

Alberto-Culver seeks prestige 22
Alberto-Culver Co.'s method of entering the $70 million "prestige" haircare market could pose problems beyond the competition it will face. Alberto-Culver says it will sell a new line only through department stores and drugstores, bypassing its strong grocery-store distribution network.

Health overtakes thinness 32
Thin's still in—18% of the population is on a diet—but the over-all goal of keeping healthy appears to be gaining ground on merely being thin as low-calorie products are joined by low-salt and low-cholesterol items, according to a study by MRCA Information Services.

Henderson after Henderson 98
The eight insiders buying Henderson Advertising from retiring founder Jim Henderson think the $80 million shop's old reputation for service and their new emphasis on creative will translate into the Southeast's first $100 million agency.

Bojangles' big push 110
Bojangles' Corp. will attempt to squeeze growth from its soft lunch and dinner dayparts with new menu items and an estimated $8 million campaign crafted to win customers away from rivals McDonald's Corp. and Kentucky Fried Chicken.

FEATURES

Einstein's theory of relativity 42
Advertising and stand-up comedy have a lot in common to Cliff Einstein, president-creative director, Dailey & Associates, Los Angeles. With Mr. Einstein's background, it's understandable that he links the two endeavors. The 46-year-old agency veteran is the son of the late comedy great Harry Einstein, who performed as "Parkyakarkas" on Eddie Cantor's radio program in the 1930s and '40s. He also has two brothers in the field, comedian/motion picture director Albert Brooks and tv writer/producer/performer Bob Einstein of the comedy show "Bizarre."

John O'Toole, recently retired as chairman of the board of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, shares the story of his start in advertising and his views on the industry in the latest part of the Benevolent Dictators series.

Saatchis eye more U.S. ties 82
Saatchi & Saatchi, the U.K.-based advertising and communications conglomerate, appears to be moving key parts of its financial operation to the U.S. At the same time, the agency has reportedly expressed an interest in buying the Michael K. Deaver & Associates public relations company.

Norway smokers ignore ad ban 82
The cigaret ad ban, a hot topic in the U.S., appears to have had little effect on tobacco consumption in Norway, which was the first free-market country to totally ban tobacco advertising in 1975.

Canadian magazines flourish 83
Canadian magazine publishers are diving head-first into the life styles of the marginally rich and the not-at-all famous. This spring, Canadian yuppies are deluged with publications that will tell them what to wear, where to wear it and what to eat while wearing it.

SPECIAL REPORT

It's been 60 years since commercial network radio broadcasting burst on the scene. In that time, network radio has blossomed, suffered setbacks with the arrival of tv and found new vitality recently. Ad revenues for 1985 totaled $328.7 million, up 14% from 1984. Network radio executives are working to see those good times keep rolling.

Coke's slump perils McCann

By NANCY GIGES

Two fast-food chains' decisions to serve Coca-Cola Classic rather than new Coke calls into question the long-term viability of the reformulated product, which could mean a billings loss of up to $50 million for Coke agency McCann-Erickson.

Oak Brook, Ill.-based McDonald's Corp., Coca-Cola's largest customer, last week said its 7,000 U.S. outlets will switch to Coca-Cola Classic as the chain's sole cola. However, nearly 500 Canadian McDonald's will stay with Coke. About 1,300 other foreign stores never switched from the original formula, now known in the U.S. as Coke Classic.

NEW YORK—Doyle Dane Bernbach reportedly held "very preliminary discussions" with R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. concerning one or more of RJR's cigaret brands after DDB decided to resign creative responsibility for three Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co. brands.

Black & Decker steaming into iron battle

By PAT McGEEHAN

Black & Decker Corp. is pressing ahead in its battle to defend the hefty market share it inherited with the 1984 purchase of General Electric's housewares division by breaking a tv spot this week for its new top-of-the-line irons.

Although GE-branded products have ruled the estimated $325 million iron category with more than a 40% market share, major competitors are drawing a bead on the category with hopped-up models and beefed-up ad budgets. Sunbeam, West Bend, Hamilton Beach and Norelco also are highlighting new iron offerings in their 1986 ad campaigns.

Towson, Md.-based B&D must remove the GE name from its products within a year, and has saved irons—the toughest fight in its rebranding effort—for last.

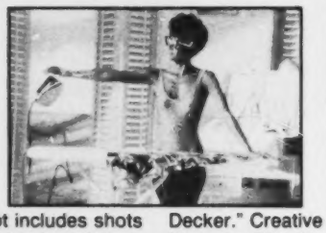
It is doing so with an entirely new game plan. B&D fired BBDO, New York, its domestic agency of record for consumer products, and hired McCann-Erickson to implement a drastically different strategy (AA, Feb. 3).

B&D's striking 30-second tv spot, the first work from McCann, plays up the GE heritage with a jingle that repeatedly intones, "GE irons are now Black & Decker," while a woman in a hot pink bathing suit irons. The spot focuses on B&D's new automatic-shut off electronic model.

B&D has not made reference to GE in previous ads.

A print ad breaking in May magazines carries the headline "Mother told me never buy anything but a GE iron. That's why I got a Black & Decker."

Black & Decker said it plans to spend at least $10 million, and $20 million if necessary, this year in broadcast and print support for its irons. B&D won't disclose its companywide 1986 ad budget but said its spending level for household products in the crucial holiday selling season will be comparable to last year when, it says, it spent about $20 million.



Black & Decker Corp.'s new tv spot includes shots of a woman in a hot pink bathing suit ironing while an upbeat jingle intones, "GE irons are now Black & Decker." Creative credits at McCann-Erickson, New York, are Dick Mercer, creative supervisor; art director: Joseph Staluppi; producer: Maria Currea.

B&D views the 1986 conversion of GE irons and toaster ovens, another category leader, as a new and important phase of the brand-transition process. That's why it reviewed agencies and altered course, said Ken Homa, vp-marketing, U.S. household products group.

Many of the ads produced by BBDO last year as part of B&D's highly touted $100 million campaign, including spots for Spacemaker cordless kitchen appliances, were "right on target" and will run again this spring, Mr. Homa said. B&D also is developing a new ad strategy for its Dustbuster cordless hand-held vacuum line. Those ads will appear in the fall.

Ads for new products introduced last week at the International Housewares Exposition in Chicago, including a mini-food processor, a one-cup coffee maker and a kitchen fire extinguisher, will break in the fall.

The prime contender for GE's small appliance crown is Oak Brook, Ill.-based Sunbeam Appliance Co., now No. 2 in irons behind GE.

Sunbeam, which shook up the industry last year with the overwhelming success of its Oskar mini-food processor, faces a double-edged challenge: The company is aggressively stalking B&D/GE's leadership position in several categories while defending Oskar's market share against a host of copycat products.

Sunbeam's iron market share has grown by 50% since 1983, said Gary Oppito, the company's marketing director.

"We've targeted the iron business as a key objective," Mr. Oppito said. "It represents a tremendous opportunity to gain volume, and we are going after it very aggressively. We're not looking to do a comparative story in our ads; we won't use an us-versus-them approach."

Bill Miller, an analyst who follows B&D for Baltimore-based Legg Mason Wood Walker, sees Sunbeam as a benefactor of the brand conversion. "This has certainly given Sunbeam an opportunity, and Sunbeam has done a super job with it. Ultimately Black & Decker will establish a good presence but it's going to be a tough fight."

Security concerns quash ad meet

By LISA E. PHILLIPS

NEW YORK—Security concerns among some U.S. members led the National Advertising Agency Network last week to cancel its semi-annual meeting scheduled later this month in Monte Carlo.

The meeting was to have been held in conjunction with NAAN's European counterpart, the nine-member European Assn. for Marketing, Advertising & Public Relations.

Cancelations and inquiries from some of the group's 45 U.S. members led to the change, said NAAN president Bob Purcell.

"We felt it wasn't prudent to stage a meeting on the Mediterranean right now," he explained.

Mr. Purcell declined to reveal the number of cancelations received, but said concern increased following a bomb blast that killed four Americans on a Trans World Airlines jet over Greece earlier this month (AA, April 7).

The Monte Carlo meeting had been set since 1983. Its agenda will be carried over to NAAN's second 1986 convention, scheduled for Salt Lake City this fall.#

Steady revenue rise creates confidence

By Laurie Freeman

Despite the lingering perception on the part of some advertisers that it is "musical wallpaper" or "a second tier medium," network radio appears to be living up to its ad campaign of a few years ago.

The truth of that campaign's tag line—"Radio is red hot"—surfaces in the medium's rising revenue totals. According to a New York-based Radio Network Assn. report, network radio's revenues were up 21% to $21.4 million in January from $17.7 million in January, 1985. Billings were up 9.5% in the first two months of this year over the similar period last year; growth projections for the first half of 1986 range from 12% to 18% more than the figures for the same period last year.

These statistics are not revolutionary; they merely perpetuate a trend. Billings more than doubled and revenues increased 68% from 1980 to 1985, according to the RNA. The networks gained 14% to $328.7 million in 1985, up from $288 million the previous year. This was 5% to 7% of all dollars spent on radio advertising in 1985, says Bob Lobdell, president-executive director of RNA.

With all of this good news, "musical wallpaper" comments may seem cruel or at least unusual. However, as one industry wag says, while a double-digit growth rate is phenomenal, New York tv stations alone billed double the network radio industry's total last year.

Still, radio network executives—apparently the Rodney Dangerfields of media—are pleased. The reason is continuity.

"Usually, [sales] are like a roller coaster, up one quarter and down the next," says Lou Severine, vp-sales, ABC Radio Networks, New York. "It's rare that sales are up every quarter, yet we've been strong since about this time last year."

The marketplace has gone through the roof, says Charles Trubia, senior vp, director-radio at Ted Bates Advertising/New York. And the shift has been in favor of the adult networks. "They have sold out before their juniors," he says.

Myriad reasons explain radio's strong showing this 60th anniversary year. More stations are signing up for network-originated programing. On the average quarter hour, two out of three radio listeners are tuned to an affiliate of the 18 RADAR-monitored networks—a figure that does not even include long-form program listenership. According to the RNA, the number of affiliated stations has increased from 2,624 in 1975 to 5,323 in 1985, or from 36% of all commercial stations in 1975 to 63% in 1985.

As the number of affiliates has boomed so has the amount of new syndicated radio shows, opening more advertising opportunities to companies eager to reach new markets. "There's a network for everyone, from age 12 to death," Mr. Severine says.

In fact, advertisers appear to be buying radio's numbers in record numbers. "There's a lot of advertiser confidence in radio that the medium will do the job," says Dick Brescia, senior vp, CBS Radio Networks. "There are a lot more base advertisers using radio. They're satisfied with the medium, and some, like Sears,

Nets work niches to blend into media mix

Network radio executives suffer no delusions of their position in the media pile. They aren't wasting time with visions of grandeur based on what once was for their industry. They have found their niche and their selling points and are hammering them home to media buyers.

Radio's advantages of reach and frequency are played up by the networks. When jousting for position with tv, they stress lower costs and more narrowly defined audiences.

"The nets are finding they can appeal to an advertiser by stressing the increased exposure he'll get on radio," says Bob Lobdell, executive director, New York-based Radio Network Assn. "Many people, especially in the desirable upper-income, high demographic group, are light tv viewers and can be reached via radio."

Advertisers are not necessarily turning away from tv, they're just discovering radio, says Stephen Youlios, vp-sales, CBS Radio Networks, New York. "Years ago you just went for tonnage of bodies when making a radio buy," he says. "Today you can zero in on a key demographic like men aged 25 to 54."

Although the networks continue to battle the "second-rate media label," more advertisers are softening their attitudes and considering using network radio, says Stephen Soule, vp-sales, NBC Radio Networks, New York. "Radio people who give a damn are constantly trying to get more advertisers into radio. It's part of what we do on a continuing basis," he says.

"When we began offering special concerts and programing, the initial advertiser response was high. It was an exciting new vehicle," Mr. Soule says. "Now, the response is beginning to mature and we have to find our niche."

From an agency viewpoint, it's the client who decides whether to use radio, says Alan Jurmain, vp, group director-media planning and operations, SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide, New York. For new product categories, like wine coolers, radio is believed to be the best media choice to build awareness of the product because of its lower costs, frequency and demographics, he says.

Youth networks, like CBS' RadioRadio, are attractive to advertisers like S.C. Johnson & Son, which targets Agree shampoo to 18-to-34-year-old women, says Leon Luxemberg, director-network relations, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York.

"Some clients are difficult to sell radio to; others love the frequency," Mr. Jurmain says. "For the beer and soft drink companies, radio is a great vehicle, but the downside is it's not tv, which can offer sight, sound and motion."

Most network radio executives acknowledge their medium is considered a secondary buy, but insist it is no longer an afterthought in media plans. More often than not, radio is used to support a print or tv campaign, helping to build frequency into the plan.

"Advertisers are finding they're getting better results when they use radio with magazines or tv," says Lou Severine, vp-sales, ABC Radio Networks, New York. "They see the effectiveness of radio."

Richard Wittstadt, senior vp-media director, Young & Rubicam/Dentsu, New York, says his agency does not use network radio to a large extent, although it is buying youth-oriented radio and tv combinations, such as "Saturday Night Live" and CBS' RadioRadio, for client Hawaiian Punch. "The efficiencies are dramatic," he says. "A network radio schedule with good reach can run about one-seventh the cost of prime-time tv."

Once cited as radio's biggest threat, network tv's use of smaller ad units has not put as much pressure on radio sales as originally feared. "I don't see anyone dropping radio because 15s are available," says Richard Brescia, senior vp-general manager, CBS Radio Networks.

Although many say 15-second tv spots will entice some smaller advertisers, tv still is priced out of many advertisers' reach. "It's hard to judge the impact of 15s because tv advertising, particularly prime time, is still expensive," Mr. Severine says. "If tv got to the point where it was really affordable, then it would be a big problem."

Fifteen-second spots don't make that much difference, says Gary Jensen, vp-marketing, Bolton Research Corp., Philadelphia. Radio, both local and network, is more affordable for small or medium-size companies and has the advantage of reaching the desired target audience, he says. "Tv is more expensive and its audience is scattered."

Sixty years ago, radio ruled the airwaves. Although tv changed that, the radio networks are determined to bring back some of the glory days—whether or not it's at the expense of their "sister" medium.

and sports formats, CBS, NBC, ABC and Mutual developed a new definition of what constituted a network. No longer seeking to fill the broadcasting day with block programing, networks moved to diversify their appeal, servicing local outlets with news on the hour, coverage of popular sporting events, special feature reports and short commentary pieces.

The networks helped turn fm radio, long overlooked in commercial radio, into a major programing force by the mid-1970s.

By the next decade, networks were targeting audiences through specialized packages such as Information, Talkradio, Rock Radio and Direction, four of ABC Network's seven networks. They also created ad hoc arrangements, like the network of U.S. outlets organized by CBS to broadcast the World Series to Spanish speakers.

If today national network radio reaches up to 90% of the U.S. and generates record profits, it is a testimony to the adaptability of national broadcasters. If newer commercial operations—like Westwood One and United Stations, as well as cable radio networks—continue to succeed, it is further testimony to the depth of the niche their predecessors discovered and to their ability to realize the potentials of modern technology.

The nickel of a nickel

Citing network radio's 5% share of all radio advertising and radio's 6% share of all media dollars, NBC Radio president Randy Bongarten says, "We're a nickel of a nickel medium."

Unwired networks work to unplug rivals' shares

By Cara S. Trager

The battle lines are drawn. Unwired radio networks not only have sharpened their marketing swords but also have strengthened their ranks in a continuing effort to take market share and business away from their greatest competitor: Wired networks.

This is a pure marketing battle, one based solely on dollars. While the major wired radio networks, like ABC, NBC and CBS, do business with their affiliated stations in terms of programing, the unwired network-station relationship has nothing to do with programing and everything to do with advertising sales.

In fact, about 60% of an unwired network's station list typically "have some type of wired network affiliation for programing and/or sales," says Stu Olds, vp-manager of New York-based Katz Radio Network. "Line network affiliation is really a programing service relationship." The station-unwired network affiliation is strictly a dollar relationship, he says.

Cara S. Trager is a frequent contributor to Special Report.

Unwired radio networks, basically sales representative organizations, have been operating for 25 years. However, they have made a determined effort to become more powerful players in the radio business in the past two to three years.

Unwired radio networks represent just 11% of total spot radio billings, but their revenues are growing. According to industry sources, unwired networks' billings increased from $55 million in 1984 to about $72 million in 1985—or about 22% of the traditional networks' revenues of $328.7 million. Unwired network executives estimate their companies will generate between $85 million and $100 million in billings in 1986.

Their growth has much to do with their joining forces, offering agencies and advertisers a greater number of stations and markets from which to choose. The alliances gave sales representative groups a competitive edge over each other and the strength to take on the wired networks.

The mega-unwired networks started taking root in late 1982, with the emergence of Internet, a sales umbrella organization for stations represented today by Weiss & Powell, McGavren Guild Radio Networks, Hillier-Newmark-Wechsler & Howard, Major Market Radio and Durpetti & Associates. Internet, New York, currently represents about 1,100 stations.

Other unwired radio networks soon consolidated. Katz Radio Network, a combined sales organization for Katz Radio, Christal Radio Network and Republic Radio, represents about 600 stations. Supernet, the New York-based umbrella organization for Eastman Radio Network, Torbet Network, Selcom Radio Network and Masla Radio, represents more than 1,100 stations, and Blair Represented Network, New York, represents about 300 stations.

The primary result of the mergers is that unwired networks, with their vast station representation, have made extensive spot radio buying less cumbersome. "All research shows that radio is difficult to buy," says William L. Stakelin, president and chief executive officer of the Radio Advertising Bureau, New York. "We view unwired as another way to package and sell radio and make it easier for the client and agency."

Vincent Gardino, general sales manager at WOR in New York, agrees. "Unwired radio networks are, frankly, an extension of spot radio to simplify matters for the agencies."

One person in a media department can deal with one person at a network, says Mike Hillstrom, national sales manager of WGN-AM, Chicago. The networks make it possible "to buy 200 stations and receive one invoice," he says. For their efforts, unwired networks receive a 15% commission from the radio station after agency commission is paid.

But unwired network executives say their role goes beyond that of a one-stop spot radio shop. Frequently they help agencies and clients design media plans, selecting the markets and stations to meet specific marketing requirements. They continuously update detailed information concerning the psychographics, demographics and ranking of each station they represent.

The flexibility to tailor station selection, unwired radio executives say, gives them a competitive edge over wired networks, which in most cases are a package deal—offering advertisers all or none of their stations. There's currently no opportunity to pick and choose stations represented by wired networks, Katz' Mr. Olds says.

"Unwired provides a service to national advertisers that they didn't have before," says Daniel Flamberg, senior vp-communciations, RAB. "It's all-encompassing, custom-designed planning, and it's the difference between going to a restaurant that serves a la carte or one that only has a complete dinner package."

But unwired networks do more than plan which courses will be served on the media menu. They also develop comprehensive merchandising programs on the local level. Although local radio tie-ins have long been a radio tradition, unwired networks have the advantage of exploiting the benefits of their daily contact with their represented stations.

"Unwired provides an opportunity to buy the most creative media and marketing effort with the least amount of headaches, because someone else does all the work," Mr. Flamberg says.

Erica Farber, vp-general manager of Interep Marketing Service, a division of Interep, the umbrella organization for Internet Radio Network, views unwired networks as a way to "provide stations with the tools to compete with other media."

Ms. Farber says unwired networks are "providing a service to station owners' needs and providing those services," says Bob Mahlman, president of Mahlman Co., a Bronxville, N.Y., media brokerage company.

"It works both ways, the key being that the network is assured the affiliate is doing what he has promised the network he'd do, and the network is supplying the services promised," he says. "The better the network serves the affiliated radio station, the greater the probability the radio station won't deviate from the network."

It all adds up to new reasons to affiliate, says RNA's Mr. Lobdell. "And it gives advertisers a new reason to buy spots.

"The stations themselves are responding to a more competitive marketplace, carving out more narrow market statements," he says. "To do that, they need services that make them unique, that will set them apart. In the 1950s, almost every station was following the 'Top 40' format, distinguished only by their on-air personalities. Now, an easy way to assume a new identity is to sign up for a national network service."

Not only has the competition among ABC, CBS and NBC for affiliate stations increased, but the battle also is fierce between the Big 3 and the growing number of syndicators. Syndicators are able to offer programing that appeals to narrow slices of a target audience.

"A lot of people have come to the conclusion that providing programing to radio stations is a good business to be in," says Stephen Soule, vp-sales, NBC Radio Networks, New York.

"Much of that's due to the change in distribution from land lines to satellites. Satellites have Roebuck & Co., are spending more." The reason more companies have turned to network radio is they have a lot more choice and greater cost efficiency than in the past, says Robert Hosking, president, CBS Radio division.

Kim Armstrong, director-advertising, AT&T Communications, says she books an "enormous" amount of time on the networks for both consumer and business spots.

"We know what we're getting from the networks in terms of a broad reach and excellent frequency at a good cost per thousand," she says.

Measures to judge network radio effectiveness vary, although some rules of thumb have been imprinted. A good level for two networks could be achieved with an average rating of 50 points, says Stephen Youlios, vp-sales, CBS Radio Networks. A radio rating point measures the size of audience against the over-all population in a market as opposed to number of households.

A buy of four to seven networks requires a minimum rating of 100 points to 125 points to be considered effective, Mr. Youlios says. "Anything below that would jeopardize frequency and penetration in a market."

Ted Bates' Mr. Trubia agrees. "Any buy below 50 points is meaningless," he says. "You've got to dig up a storm."

One agency negotiator says a network's affiliate strength and not cost per rating point should determine a media plan.

Those plans should include multiple network buys, says Laurie Reinadorf, associate media director, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. "Coverage by any one network is erratic at best," she says. "So you've got to buy multiple networks including the unwired, even though they're more expensive."

Most important, CBS' Mr. Brescia says, is agencies and advertisers now know what they are getting for their money. "Ad agencies believe the networks are working harder with stations to make sure that [commercial] reporting is done as accurately and quickly as possible." Mr. Brescia refers to the strict policing of station affidavits, a result of the 1983 RKO Radio Networks scandal.

The network—since bought by Dick Clark and renamed United Stations—overbilled clients $5.9 million for spots that never ran or ran in poorly rated programs. The ad agencies involved, including Young & Rubicam, Ogilvy & Mather, Needham Harper Worldwide and Wells, Rich, Greene, were given the option to pick up cash credits, make-goods or both. The incident prompted other radio networks to examine their own billing procedures, bolstering the industry's accountability.

"RKO is behind us now, I hope," Mr. Brescia says. "We're healthier in the long run because agencies are asking tough questions of the networks and we have to answer them."

Network executives also say communication between the networks and their affiliate stations is improving, resulting in an industry that is more responsive in recognizing station needs and developing new programing.

"It's because networks are serving their stations better. The networks are listening to wired as a "middle-person" between agency and station in designing and implementing on-air product giveaways, call-in promotions or celebrity appearances.

"We try to see what's good for the station and advertiser, because we realize that what works in Philadelphia may not work in Baltimore," Ms. Farber says.

Flexibility is the byword of unwired radio networks—and a major point of difference to wired networks. "Unwired offers clout and control," says Ellen Hulleberg, president of McGavren Guild.

With unwired radio networks, "we won't sell your snow tires in Miami," says Marty Damin, manager-network operations at Eastman Radio. "Instead, we'll give you the 40 stations that make sense for your product."

That kind of control also extends to timing. "With unwired, you not only select stations you want, but you can provide different copy for each and have it run at different times and at different starting dates," Ms. Hulleberg says.

Unwired networks also offer guaranteed clearance. "One of the reasons an agency goes to unwired is that you are assured your communication will run at the time you want, and you pay for that," says Frank McDonald, exec vp, director-media and marketing services at Cunningham & Walsh, New York. "When you buy wired, there could be clearance problems, and that's reflected in the price." He estimates an ad placed on a wired network costs about half as much as one placed on unwired networks.

Some industry executives say that buying through an unwired network can be cheaper than buying spot radio. Katz' Mr. Gilds estimates advertisers buying radio stations in groupings can enjoy savings of 2% to 15%, depending upon the markets, stations and demographics. "There is some kind of savings because the agency has more leverage against the network because of the big dollars involved," he says.

Says a key industry insider: "The rate stations get as part of unwired is sometimes lower than the spot rate."

WGN's Mr. Hillstrom disagrees. "That was the whole premise of attracting advertisers to unwired six to seven years ago, when unwired was designed to compete with wired, which is cheaper. At that time, unwired reps would try to finagle lower rates, but that's not true today," he says.

"Advertisers are smart enough to know that cheaper isn't always better, and that quality stations will not sell time at discount rates."

For the stations, unwired radio networks "create new dollars for radio that ordinarily would have gone to tv, print or outdoor advertising," he says. "It's not taking away from wired, which is alive and well, but it's developing dollars from other sources."

At WGN, unwired accounted for about 8% of its national business in 1985. This year, Mr. Hillstrom says he expects that percentage to climb to 12% and to 15% in 1987. "In unwired, everyone is a winner," he says. "There's no downside."

Cunningham & Walsh's Mr. McDonald doesn't necessarily agree, saying some unwired networks—because of their vast station representation and their responsibility to sell those stations—tend to toss in a station that may not be appropriate.

An executive at an unwired network answers such allegations by saying it is the agency's burden to check the validity of a suggested schedule.

"An agency has the choice of not buying the list if he [the buyer] chooses not to."

Others say the appropriateness of a radio station is more a subjective than objective matter. "It's really a matter of opinion," Ms. Hulleberg says. "You can't force a station [into a schedule], and a salesperson who does that and puts things under the rug [risks losing] trust, and business disappears."

In an atmosphere as charged as radio—where unwired networks must battle for dollars against wired and spot, not to mention other media forms—unwired networks are determined to increase business.

had the greatest impact on the youth-oriented networks. Land lines were acceptable for voice, but satellite delivery brought clean air quality and a great signal."

Increasingly, the lines are blurring between "traditional" network radio and syndication. Networks are syndicating programs and syndicators are buying networks. Culver City, Cal.-based Westwood One, for example, now owns the Mutual Radio Network.

"Network radio now means syndication, yet it's hard to imagine syndication without network radio," says Alan Jurmain, vp, group director-media planning and operations, SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide, New York. "Syndication has more advantages, allowing a station to custom design their own programing."

The larger programing inventory allows agencies and their clients to reach finer target segments via network offerings. "With so many options and the reasonable cost of radio, an agency can build a good plan with a lot of reach to go with the frequency," Mr. Brescia says.

More program development, new network services and possible mergers among syndicators and networks all are in the planning stages. While they say they appreciate the current growth curve, most executives say sales will settle down to a steady 8% to 10% growth rate.

"We [the networks] used to consider ourselves ambulance chasers," Mr. Severine says. "We'd see a brand on their last few dollars and we'd get them to put it in radio. Those days now are gone."

Faberge follows ABC in sidelining Namath

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—After being waived by ABC-TV's "Monday Night Football," Joe Namath has been cut from the Faberge team as well.

"There's nothing doing with him as far as I'm concerned," said Faberge chairman Dan Manella. Added company president Steve Manenti in a separate interview, "Namath is being phased out because of the ABC thing and also because of some ads he did in Florida for a racetrack that were not right for our image."

This is expected to end the football Hall of Famer's on-again, off-again status at Faberge. Last year, exec vp-marketing Bill Tauriello said Mr. Namath's commercial use was being reconsidered.

After ABC assigned the former New York Jets quarterback as its football color commentator, Faberge announced it would be using him in a special campaign for Brut, which was supposed to break this May (AA, Feb. 25, '85, et seq.).

Messrs. Manella and Manenti's comments preceded a press conference to announce that "Knots Landing" star Donna Mills had been named Faberge's fashion and beauty director, a role that will include endorsing Aqua Net hair products in a $9 million print and tv campaign from Faberge agency of record Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt.

Faberge's total ad budget is $25 million this year, up 15% from last year, Mr. Manella said.

Even without Mr. Namath, there will still be a new Brut campaign in several weeks with a budget of $5 million-plus. This campaign will run in conjunction with the current "Smells like a man" theme.

Although Mr. Manella said the new campaign would be "thematic" and not involve a spokesman "per se," he said it will still use a "box-office star in a thematic sweepstakes and ad campaign."

Mr. Manella would not identify this box-office name but noted no former product endorsers associated with Faberge would ever again be used in advertising.

The exception is Cary Grant, who was not really an endorser but a member of the Faberge board when McGregor Corp. acquired the company in 1984. Mr. Grant continues to make personal appearances for Faberge and could become involved in advertising. But Mr. Manella maintained the actor won't be a part of this new campaign.

Mr. Manella also noted that in the retail marketplace consumers remain confused about the difference between the Brut fragrance and lower-price Brut 33 toiletries line.

He would not say what Faberge might do to clarify the product lines or whether it might discontinue one of them.

Faberge management already has sold off Ceramic Glaze Nail Color, a company it reacquired in late 1984 as an entree into the color cosmetics business.

A decision has been made to concentrate on toiletries and fragrances for now, Mr. Manella said. However, Ms. Mills alluded last week to a cosmetics line that would carry her name. Mr. Manenti said such a line is "a possibility."

Mr. Manella said that he would like to see Faberge acquire a beauty company by yearend.

Faberge, which last year had sales of $273 million and pretax profits of $32.3 million, had at one time tried to buy Halston from Max Factor, Mr. Manella said. "We would like to buy a company that's a fragrance house, because right now we feel we're more in the toiletry than fragrance field," he said.

As earlier reported, Faberge is reintroducing in the mass market Tigress and Tigress Musk, in addition to its Aphrodisia for men, Woodhue for women and Kiku for women fragrance lines.

Agency moves 1
The stories behind the major agency moves of the week: Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s purchase of Backer & Spielvogel came about in part because B&S' leaders sensed that its lack of international offices had become a greater liability than ever. B&S was excluded from major new-business pitches because it did not have overseas offices. Meanwhile, Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, whose New York office has suffered significant account setbacks, has converted those losses into an opportunity to triple its presence in the Big Apple through the acquisition of Leber Katz Partners.

The fear factor 3
Fear of terrorism, sharpened by the U.S. bombing of Libya last week, is changing personal conduct and business practices worldwide, and that includes the advertising and marketing communities.

A taxing situation 3
An Internal Revenue Service ruling limiting the deductibility of packaging costs could have far-reaching implications for package-goods marketers. But food and consumer products companies say they aren't going to go down without a fight.

In the swim 4
After two years without getting near the water, swimwear marketers are diving into the spring sales season with swimsuits tailored to women who have left their teen years behind. Leading manufacturers are catering to women aged 20 to 40 with fashionable one-piece suits that feature figure-contouring darts, silhouette-softening ruffles and high-cut leg openings intended to draw the eye upward, making legs look longer and thighs slimmer.

Powerful medicine 6
Add Ogilvy & Mather—and by the end of this year probably Doyle Dane Bernbach as well—to the rapidly growing ranks of agencies with new, specialized consumer/medical units. Fueled by vast changes in the booming healthcare marketing field, hybrid agencies are being born that specialize in promoting healthcare products and services directly to consumers rather than medical professionals.

Barnyard battle 24
Holly Farms Poultry and Perdue Farms, locked in a feather-flying battle over who has the leanest low-fat chicken, are now squawking over false ad claims.

Scaling up 35
Washington Post executive editor Ben Bradlee is bringing his paper's Sunday magazine out of the bargain basement with a redesigned book he hopes will attract national advertisers. Mr. Bradlee plans a smaller, glossy book to replace the Post's current magazine—originally designed for "people who read with their lips," he said, and filled with budget ads.

Nothing to bubble over 86
The once-sparkling champagne category may be going flat as over-all consumption fell slightly last year for the first time in this decade. Early estimates show total champagne/sparkling wine consumption was down almost 2% in 1985. The leveling off was attributed to continued consumption declines of domestic brands, paired with a slowdown in the import segment.

Too much of a good thing? 102
Large-scale fund-raising events such as Live Aid or FarmAid are becoming more common every day. But some ad and tv executives are concerned that the sheer number of these new events, coupled with a fatigue factor, might undermine interest in the fund-raisers.

Innovation on the rise 22
Although the number of new-product introductions slumped 7% in 1985, the big marketers have become more innovative. That's the conclusion of Innovation Index, a new-product innovation service of Initiatives Group. The Index indicating level of innovations shows a rise to 16.4% in 1985, up from 9.5% a year earlier.

Lowe's the best 60
Lowe Howard-Spink Marschalk's outstanding creative work through 1985 in print and tv for clients such as Vauxhall Motors Ltd. (General Motors Corp.), Heineken beer, Toys "R" Us and the British Broadcasting Corp. led to its selection as Advertising Age's International Agency of the Year. In the same section, beginning on Page 63, the Foreign Agency Income Report covers 911 agencies in 71 countries giving information on gross income and billings for 1985 and 1984.

SPECIAL REPORT

Business publications prosper or suffer with the industries they cover. And as markets become more segmented, the magazines serving those categories target smaller, more defined audiences. Special Report looks at the business press, which reported a 16% increase in ad revenue in 1985 for 139 business publications while ad pages declined 2%.

BJK&E unit cut by steak house

By SCOTT HUME

Ponderosa has moved the $21 million assignment for its steak house division to Lowe Marschalk, New York, from USAdvertising, the shop spun off from Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York.

The shift is the third agency move in little more than a year for Ponderosa and a blow to BJK&E, which had created USAdvertising in order to retain Quaker State Motor Oil and Ponderosa, two accounts put in conflict by the merger (AA, Jan. 20). Kenyon & Eckhardt had the Ponderosa business; Bozell & Jacobs handled McDonald Corp.'s co-op accounts in Atlanta, Chicago, Houston and New Orleans. Earlier this month,

Is Kraft returning to freezer?

By JULIE FRANZ

Chicago—Kraft Inc. may be eyeing a spot in grocers' freezer cases.

Food-industry insiders last week speculated that such a plan may be behind Foote, Cone & Belding's abrupt resignation of approximately $10 million in business from Sara Lee Corp.'s Kitchens of Sara Lee unit, assignments the agency concluded were on an inevitable, long-range "collision course" with its estimated $30 million Kraft account.

"The long-term direction of the Kraft Venture Group and the direction of Sara Lee are on a collision course," said Greg Blaine, FCB deputy general

Ogilvy joins consumer-medical ad trend

Healthcare explosion leads to hybrids

By STEWART ALTER

Add Ogilvy & Mather—and by the end of this year probably Doyle Dane Bernbach as well—to the rapidly growing ranks of agencies with new, specialized consumer/-medical units.

Fueled by vast changes in the booming healthcare marketing field, hybrid agencies are being born that specialize in promoting healthcare products and services directly to consumers rather than to their traditional targets: The medical professionals.

O&M is the only agency not to use the affiliation of its medical subsidiary, Rolf Werner Rosenthal, when it formed O&M HealthCare. The new unit became a formal entity this year after an informal startup in '85.

More typically, these units are offshoots of the medical units, which specialize in reaching doctors and other medical professionals, e.g., Medicus Consumer Communications, launched earlier this year by D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles' Medicus Intercon.

J. Walter Thompson USA has reorganized and renamed its medical advertising operation, creating J. Walter Thompson Healthcare. It includes both JWT's Deltakos medical agency and a new consumer division.

Vince Trovati, formerly an exec vp-group director of Young & Rubicam's Sudler & Hennessey, has joined as head of the new combined operation, while Robert Belinoff, who has had his own healthcare marketing company, joins to head the new consumer division. Jack Stevens remains in charge of Deltakos.

"There is dynamic change in the industry," said Bert Metter, vice-chairman of JWT USA, to whom healthcare operations report. "Clients are looking for fresh approaches and new thinking."

Said O&M Healthcare senior vp-general manager Doug Bruce, "From a business standpoint, healthcare is going through an enormous growth period. We're seeing companies that never advertised their over-the-counter products starting to do so, and products that were Rx-only now going over the counter."

Arthur Rosen, exec vp-director, Young & Rubicam's Sudler & Hennessey Consumer Group, the first in this field in 1981, gave a few examples of ethical products that had gone otc—Benadryl allergy medication and Benylin cough syrup—and otc products that had begun to advertise for the first time—Mylanta and Maalox antacids.

"To this, one could add dozens," Mr. Rosen added. "We're talking about a phenomenon."

Among other factors fueling the growth of this field, Mr. Rosen mentioned the role of technology in developing new classes of products, such as in-home pregnancy and ovulation tests, and new healthcare delivery systems, such as optical centers and weight-control centers. Another area is Health Maintenance Organizations, which doubled their advertising expenditures in a year to become a $100 million ad category in 1985 (AA, Dec. 30).

And as still another factor, he cited the "growth of patient information as a whole category," meaning companies that are running corporate-type campaigns in which they discuss a condition or disease generally, but stick to Food & Drug Administration guidelines by not mentioning the product they are marketing as the cure.

This approach "doesn't make sense for a tired product or a product with 15% to 20% of the market," said William Castagnoli, president, Medicus Intercon North America, "but when you're really the dominant force, you can expand the market and get a major share of that expansion." Medicus' most notable client in this area is Merrell-Dow's Nicorette, a prescription gum to help people quit smoking; the company runs ads that talk about quitting without mentioning Nicorette.

All of this is expected to lead toward the eventual advertising, direct to consumers, of prescription pharmaceuticals by name. The FDA has encouraged companies to

A column in the university's newspaper turned his efforts into a minor cause celebre. "It started as, well, something to do. But then I found that a lot of other people were concerned [about the red candy's plight]. With word of mouth, and some press coverage, it just snowballed."

Weaver's software turns touch of keyboard into patterned softwear

Your clothes may never look the same. Or your sofa. Or your sheets.

Thanks to computer-assisted weaving, artists like New Yorker Lois Bryant can design wilder fabrics than ever before. The artists, in turn, sell their prototypes to the textile industry, which reproduces them for use in fashion and decorating.

Bryant designs for Knoll and SunarHauserman office furniture and Brunschwig & Fils home decorative fabrics. She also teaches one of country's first computer weaving courses at the Parsons School of Design, New York.

Without a personal computer, the 31-year-old weaver explains, designing a pattern means first drawing it by hand on graph paper using little x's. If artists want to see what the pattern will really look like, they must prepare the loom and weave a couple of inches. This can take hours.

With a computer program, however, drawing the design is as simple as punching in xxx. For Bryant, who lives and works in a spacious downtown Manhattan loft, her IBM personal computer means more than just a convenient drawing board. It means quick access to hundreds of possibilities.

Normally, each different line of the woven design requires threading through an individual "harness," or screen, attached to a treadle.

These treadles hang like organ pedals under the loom. Although Bryant's loom has 18 treadles, she could only reach about five with ease.

Still, the more treadles, the richer the weave, but more than once, she admits, "The number of treadles would go into my aesthetic decision."

The computer allows her to "press" the equivalent of hundreds of treadles from her keyboard. She has already designed one cloth requiring 200 of them. When she looks at her precomputer work now, she groans, "It's so simple." With the new technology, "We're going to see a lot of fancy weaves we didn't see five years ago."

Beta's presence growing dim in videotape market

In the videocassette recorder format race, VHS is leaving Beta at the gate.

According to reports released from the recent International Tape/Disc Assn.'s annual seminar in Palm Springs, Cal., the consensus was that VHS and 8mm shares of blank videotape sales will continue to grow at the expense of Beta. In 1985, the VHS to Beta ratio was 4-to-1. Tape manufacturers are predicting a 9-to-1 slant by the end of 1986.

Also, sales of 8mm videotapes, introduced in 1984 by Eastman Kodak, Rochester, N.Y., continue to rise at a dramatic rate. Manufacturers who attended the trade seminar, including representatives of TDK Electronics, Tandy Corp., Sony Corp. and BASF Corp., are predicting sales of 2 million units in 1986.

Not surprisingly, video store owners are curtailing their supplies of Beta videocassettes. The nation's largest video rental chain, Portland, Ore.-based National Video, is reorganizing its Beta rentals so only one franchise in each area will handle Beta. The 185-store Network Video chain, based in Sarasota, Fla., has dropped its Beta format and so have others, including Video Paradise, Boston, and Turtles Records and Tapes, Atlanta.

But there are still some Beta fans out there. The magnetic tape division of Sony, Park Ridge, N.J., has released figures showing strong Beta sales growth at the professional/industrial level.

Child's play reflects signs of the times: Toys, records deal with abuse, abduction, drugs

You might say it's a sign of the times.

Many toys, games, books and records targeted at kids today have progressed way beyond mere childish diversions. In fact, some of them are downright sobering. A number of marketers have introduced products designed to teach youngsters about such issues as child abuse, drugs and traffic safety.

Playmore, New York, which has sold more than 6 million "It's O.K. to Say No to Drugs" coloring and activity books since 1985, now has added "The Pros Say It's O.K. to Say No to Drugs!"

The coloring books feature such Major League Baseball stars as New York Yankee Dave Winfield.

Tele-Story Products, Chatsworth, Cal., is offering records and audiotapes titled "Straight Talk for Kids" on child abduction, which features Bill Cosby, and "Say No to Drugs & Alcohol," which features Soleil Moon Frye, tv's Punky Brewster.

Fort Lauderdale-based Child Awareness Inc.'s The Child Awareness Game, is a board game in which kids must answer questions about potentially risky situations in order to advance their playing pieces.

Thousands of parents have said yes to buying "It's O.K. to Say No" coloring and activity books for children from Playmore, New York.

Other new products on the market have more to do with parental peace of mind than fun and games: Identibears is a do-it-yourself identification and fingerprint kit from Kamar International, Torrance, Cal. Teddy Tagums from Playline, Northfield, Ill., are child ID tags in the form of blue plastic bears that can be attached to clothing.

When did playtime become so serious?

FOREIGN AGENCY INCOME

Y&R group holds on to top spot

By DENNIS CHASE

Young & Rubicam, the biggest agency group in the world for the second year in a row, lengthened its lead over the rest of the pack in 1985.

According to Advertising Age's annual Foreign Agency Income survey of 911 agencies in 71 countries, the Y&R group's 1985 gross income was $536 million, or 11.7% ahead of 1984. The group's billings similarly rose, to $3.58 billion.

Y&R's gross income was $55 million ahead of second-place finisher, the Ogilvy Group, and $63 million ahead of Dentsu, Japan's biggest agency, which finished third. In 1984, Dentsu was supplanted as the world's biggest agency for the first time in 11 years, when Y&R sneaked in by a gross income margin of only $11.6 million.

The strong U.S. dollar in 1985 continued to help U.S. agencies and hurt foreign shops. Also, Dentsu, which leads all agencies in billings, calculates gross income at 13.5% of billings, but Y&R uses 15%.

The Ogilvy Group's strong showing, caused by a 14.3% increase in worldwide billings, moved the group from fourth to second place in the rankings. Much of this gain was attributed to a growth in new business, both in the U.S. and abroad.

New agency combinations also caused a reshuffling. In 1984, D'Arcy MacManus Masius was the 13th-biggest worldwide agency group, and Benton & Bowles was 16th. This year, DMM would have ranked No. 16, and B&B would have been No. 18, if listed separately. Instead, the combined agency ranked No. 9 in 1985.

Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt was the 16th-largest agency group in 1985, but separately Bozell & Jacobs would have ranked about No. 22, and Kenyon & Eckhardt would have ranked about No. 27—very close to their 1984 rankings.

Non-U.S. agencies also are making inroads. U.K.-based Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide moved up one place, to No. 6, overtaking BBDO International.

Saatchi & Saatchi is close to supplanting J. Walter Thompson Co. as the world's fifth-largest agency, and the holding company, Saatchi & Saatchi Co. PLC, this year jumped past the JWT Group in the rankings of holding companies for the first time. Interpublic Group of Cos. remains the world's largest agency holding company, with $707.4 million in gross income, compared with Saatchi's $583.9 million.

GGK Holding, a Swiss-based agency group, also moved into the list for the first time, at No. 45.

The 1986 rankings will reflect further inroads by foreign agencies. The takeover of Dancer Fitzgerald Sample by Dorland Advertising in the U.K., part of the Saatchi & Saatchi group, creates an agency with a gross income of $148 million now. That would have put them No. 18 on the 1985 list, if the takeover had occurred in 1985.

The new Lowe Marschalk Worldwide agency, made up of Lowe Howard-Spink Marschalk Ltd. in the U.K. and the Marschalk Campbell-Ewald foreign network, is expected to make the list of top 50 agency groups in 1986.

Japanese agencies that do not have strong shops outside Japan seem to be suffering because of the slowdown in Japanese advertising expenditures. Hakuhodo, the second-largest agency in Japan, saw gross income grow only $1.2 million, and is in danger of falling behind SSC&B:Lintas.

Similarly, Asatsu and Daiko grew slowly, but Dai-Ichi Kikaku went from 30th to 26th place, largely because of its increased investment in the U.S., Taiwan and Korea.

U.S. agencies with a large percentage of billings abroad did well in 1985. TBWA, with 73.4% of its billings outside the U.S., moved from No. 38 to No. 34. HCM, with 66.9% of its billings abroad, moved up from No. 26 to No. 25 (see Page 82). Both Y&R's and O&M's foreign billings grew faster than their domestic billings last year.

By contrast, agencies with a declining percentage of non-U.S. billings fared less well. Leo Burnett Co.'s share of foreign billings out of its total billings fell from 34.7% to 32%; BBDO International, from 30.5% to 27.3%, and Foote, Cone & Belding, from 26.5% to 24.7%. All of these agencies fell in the rankings in 1985.#

With Argentinian agencies, AA altered its procedure of determining an agency's "real growth" (applying 1985 exchange rates to 1984 returns) because it primarily shows the impact of inflation in that economy. Dollar figures for 1984 are based on the average annual exchange rate (.0289) for that year.

Notes to individual listings

GENERAL

Advertising Age encountered problems this year with the worldwide mailing of the questionnaires for the Foreign Agency Income issue. There may be some agencies that didn't receive it and therefore are not listed in this issue. AA will make sure next year that everyone will receive the questionnaire in plenty of time. At the same time, if agencies are not on our mailing list and would like to be listed in next year's issue, please write to Ilse Cermak, Foreign Agency Income editor, 740 Rush St., Chicago, Ill. 60611

Warning: Many agencies did not comply with AD AGE instructions to list an agency's gross income separately from other companies in the group. When we could accurately estimate an agency's gross income, as in the U.K., we have published an AD AGE estimate. In those cases where an agency reported different gross income figures than authorities or publications within a country, we published the locally reported figure.

that is inscribed, "From Margaret, with love."

In fact, a competitor recalled the time Mr. Bell opened a business meeting by telling an important client, "When I spoke to Maggie last night, she asked me to pass on her regards."

Mr. Bell is not a founding partner and his name doesn't appear on the agency's masthead, but U.K. ad industry sources agree that his presence undoubtedly adds to the agency's already solid reputation.

The Australian-born Mr. Bell, 44, began his career as a jazz musician but became a media buyer because it paid better.

He was media director at Geers Gross Advertising, a U.K. shop, when Charles Saatchi approached him in 1970 and asked if he wanted to start a new agency with Mr. Saatchi and his brother, Maurice

Mr. Bell signed on and stayed with the Saatchi brothers for the next 14 years, until he teamed up with his old friend, Frank Lowe, in 1985.

"I'd known Frank for 12 years and wanted to work with him, and I no longer wanted to work at Saatchi & Saatchi," Mr. Bell said.#

CATEGORY REVIEW: CAR-RENTAL COMPANIES

Vacationers hold ticket for car-rental growth

By GARY LEVIN

The $4.5 billion car-rental industry, faced with declining profits and soaring insurance costs, is targeting the leisure-travel market as its best avenue for growth.

At the same time, those factors are forcing rental rates upward. Increases between 15% and 20% are expected this year.

Spring campaigns from the four largest car-rental companies—Hertz, Avis, National and Budget—target vacationers in family-oriented tv and print ads. And while print ads continue to focus on pricing, tv spots now fold price information into image-oriented ads.

Some marketers, taking their cue from airlines and hotels, also have begun targeting specific segments—such as senior citizens and government employes—with clubs and discount offers.

The change in marketing focus stems in part from seasonal factors, since vacationers constitute a larger portion of rentals during summer months. But heavier discounting by airlines and hotel chains, coupled with fears generated by overseas terrorism and threats, is prompting many vacationers to stick to the U.S. (AA, March 31, et seq.).

Major rental companies hope those factors translate into increased use of domestic car rentals. Syndicated research shows just 21% of all adults rented a car during 1985, but that figure was up substantially from 11% in '82.

Continued growth has some industry executives predicting double-digit sales increases this year.

"The over-all size of the market is still heavily weighed toward the business segment," said Rajiv Tandon, vp-general manager of Minneapolis-based National Car Rental System and president of the American Car Rental Assn., a Washington-based industry trade group. "But [percentage] growth now comes from leisure travelers."

In the fairly stagnant business-rental sector, companies have found it tough to win added sales from corporate clients. "You can't create new business-rental situations," added Dick Dixon, vp-marketing services at Budget Rent a Car Corp., Chicago.

Because most major companies already have lined up corporate clients, "it's a share fight to see who's going to take away from whom," he said.

The "Big 4" companies all are units of much larger conglomerates, so exact sales and profit figures are unavailable. But industry reports show either net losses or huge profit declines in 1985, due mainly to fierce price competition and ballooning liability insurance premiums, which have climbed 70% to 100% in a year for some.

Another major problem for the industry is the soft used-car market, on which rental companies depend to generate cash and rid their fleets of worn-out vehicles.

To recover those costs, both business and leisure travelers this year will likely pay more for the privilege of renting a car. Major companies plan rental price increases of 15% to 20%.

Hertz Corp., New York, retains its "No. 1" designation in practice, though not in the company's advertising, with 32.8% of the airport rental market.

Avis-Rent-A-Car, Garden City, N.Y., is second with 26.2%, while National and Budget rank third and fourth with 20.4% and 16.2%, respectively.

(All other rental companies control just 4.4% of airport rentals.)

Budget will continue using its "America's personal favorite" tag line in print ads aimed at leisure travelers, while maintaining a wholly separate campaign for the business market.

The unit of Transamerica Corp., San Francisco, says it already draws 40% to 50% of its business from vacationers—the highest ratio among major renters—because of its name and image as a low-price company.

"Budget owns the price position in consumers' minds," Mr. Dixon said. "Our marketing thrust and marketing position are not going to change. . .but we'll continue to build more emphasis on the quality part of the equation."

Toward that end—and the goal of increasing its share of the business market—the company on March 27 broke a $2.25 million spring campaign with only its second tv spot in nearly three years (AA, March 24).

The ads introduced a new theme line "We're going your way," and targeted business travelers, highlighting Budget's $39.95-a-day Lincoln Town Car.

The effort is part of Budget's $10 million annual ad spending—a figure unchanged from last year—handled by D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago.

Car-rental marketers, including Budget, also are seeking growth from "new" niches like the high-performance sports car category. This month Budget was to announce a $44.95-a-day Merkur—a high-performance car imported by Lincoln-Mercury—to be backed by a print campaign to break in May.

Budget also will be mentioned in a Lincoln-Mercury campaign for the model breaking later this month from Young & Rubicam.

National in recent years has seen more of its business come from the leisure market as it and other companies maintain loyalties of corporate clients.

Commercial accounts represent 75% to 80% of National's rentals, including leisure rentals handled through corporate clients.

But the leisure market itself has grown from just 20% of the company's business in 1983 to 31% last year (including corporate clients' vacation bookings).

Part of that growth comes from discretionary travelers such as retired senior citizens, the subject of a new "Silver Opportunities" program to be kicked off May 1 via direct-mail pitches.

The program offers rental discounts and tie-ins with similar offers from companies such as American Airlines and Holiday Inns (AA, March 24).

National also has begun offering a standard $27-a-day rate on subcompacts to all military and government employes, another tactic employed by Holiday and others in the travel and lodging industries.

For the more typical traveler, National planned to break a tv and print campaign May 1 supporting a new one-way rental program, in which cars can be rented in northern cities and dropped off in Florida and other areas.

It also starts a weekly rental special on June 1—supported by tv and print—offering two days free with seven paid rental days.

Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., handles National, which is a unit of Household International, Prospect Heights, Ill.

The company won't disclose its ad budget, but Leading National Advertisers puts non-newspaper ad spending at $12.2 million in 1984 and $11.3 million in the first nine months of '85, the latest period for which figures are available. (Car-rental companies, however, spend heavily in newspapers, advertising not measured by LNA.)

Hertz' new owner, United Airlines parent UAL Inc., Elk Grove Village, Ill., has repositioned the company as a total-service provider. It no longer brags that "Hertz is No. 1," though it can still claim that distinction.

New ads via Scali, McCabe Sloves, New York, are themed "Don't just rent a car, rent a company."

Hertz, purchased last year for $587.5 million from RCA Corp., will spend an estimated $20 million this year on advertising. It spent $10 million on non-newspaper advertising in the first nine months of 1985 and $12.3 million in all of '84, LNA says.

Avis also has stressed service for both business and leisure travelers with its "So easy" tag line via Ted Bates Advertising/New York. It also has launched "SuperValue" rates. One tv spot that started airing in March portrays a young businesswoman renting a car for the first time (AA, March 10), while another broke April 1 aimed at families who think vacation car rentals are too expensive.

Avis spent $7 million on non-newspaper advertising in the first nine months of 1985 and $12 million in all of '84.

Despite price hikes, competition will continue unabated in popular U.S. vacation markets such as California, Florida and Hawaii, with newspaper and tv support emphasizing specific rates and models.

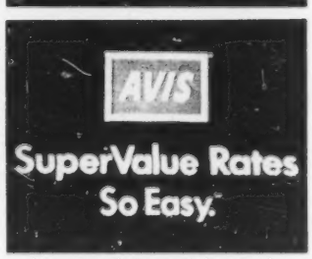
That strategy is used most often by smaller companies such as Alamo Rent-a-Car, Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and Dallas-based American International Rent-a-Car Corp.#

Reporter Lisa E. Phillips in New York contributed to this report.

Airport car-rental marketshares

The car-rental industry's new focus on leisure travelers may spur share increases among leaders in that category. Figures are for year ended Jan. 30, 1986. Source: Advertising Age.

Budget Rent a Car Corp. has moved from an exclusively price-oriented ad strategy to an image approach in a new spot that began airing last month (AA, March 24). The effort introduced a new theme line, "We're going your way," via D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago.



Avis-Rent-A-Car takes a more personal approach to rental-car advertising, stressing new, lower "SuperValue" rates in a "Family Vacation" spot. A couple, photographed in closeup, plans a trip despite a tight budget, with Avis' help.

National Car Rental System is one company targeting specific market segments such as military and government employes. National offers all such workers a $27 daily rate on subcompact rentals with targeted print ads.

HHCC tops at AA awards fete

Chicago—Clutching his award statuette and admittedly at a loss for words, George (Jay) Hill III, chairman of Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos said he was "deeply honored and astonished" to be receiving the Agency of the Year award at last week's first Advertising Age Awards Dinner here.

The event was sponsored by Advertising Age as a benefit for the Museum of Broadcast Communications, a not-for-profit organization established to collect, preserve, interpret and exhibit historic documentation from the fields of radio, tv and broadcast advertising. Arthur C. Nielsen Jr., chairman of A.C. Nielsen Co., chairs the museum's board of directors.

Boston-based HHCC was selected from among three previously announced finalists for the award, which Advertising Age editor-in-chief Rance Crain said honors "major creative initiative" by an advertising agency. This year's other finalists for the Agency of the Year award were Foote, Cone & Belding, headquartered in Chicago, and Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, New York.

Appropriately, the more than 500 agency and client-company executives attending the April 22 dinner gave one of the largest

By STEWART ALTER

New York—Doyle Dane Bernbach Group, Needham Harper Worldwide and BBDO International were expected last week to agree to create a new agency holding company that immediately would become the biggest in the world, with billings of more than $5 billion and gross worldwide income of $736 million.

The new group would replace Interpublic Group of Cos., with its $4.7 billion in billings and worldwide gross income of $707 million, as the largest agency holding company. BBDO is the sixth largest U.S.-based agency in the world with $2.5 billion in billings, while DDB is 12th at $1.7 billion and Needham is 16th at $847 million.

It is expected that the holding company would be used to circumvent major account conflicts that would have prevented an outright merger. DDB handles Volkswagen, while Needham handles Honda and BBDO is the agency for Dodge. Needham also has Anheuser-Busch business, while BBDO is agency of record for Stroh Brewery Co.

Sources said late April 25 that the three agencies were preparing an announcement on the new holding company. The agencies had no comment at press time.

DDB's overture to Needham was the second time they have taken a pass at each other in recent months (AA, Sept. 2). DDB's IBM Corp. account no longer is a conflict as it was then, now that the $40 million Xerox Corp. account left Needham, taking away with it a quarter of Needham's New York billings.

New York—Joseph E. Seagram & Sons is expected to introduce a line of spirit-based coolers with a name and packaging similar to the new Seagram's Golden Wine Cooler it unveiled April 25 (see related story on Page 98).

Seagram is presenting its new spirit-based Seagram's Golden Spirits line to the trade in some Midwest and Florida markets for a probable summer introduction (AA, March 24).

It is not known whether the line

Armour account returns to BJK&E

Ballwin, Mo.—ConAgra's Armour Frozen Foods unit has shifted its $15 million Dinner Classics and Classic Light account to Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Dallas, from Fallon McElligott Rice, Minneapolis. FMR gained the account from BJK&E last September after a review (AA, Sept. 9, et seq.). BJK&E's Dallas office also handles Armour's $10 million processed meats account. In addition, BJK&E's Chicago office has won the multi-million-dollar corporate account of Gould Inc., Rolling Meadows, Ill. The agency's Boston office got the $2 million account for Gould's Industrial Automation Systems Group. Both accounts previously were at Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston.

Hicks & Greist adds $13M after losing $5M

New York—Hicks & Greist says nine new accounts and new assignments from current clients added during the first quarter topped $13 million in ad and pr billings, offsetting a loss of three accounts billing $5 million. New clients included Gaseteria, a chain of 50 budget-price gas stations (a first-time advertiser), while new assignments included Coty's Lady Stetson and Pfizer's Bonine motion-sickness tablets.

RJR sets up media buy unit

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

New York—Ohlmeyer Communications Cos., a joint venture between Don Ohlmeyer and Winston-Salem, N.C.-based RJR Nabisco, has consolidated all of RJR Nabisco's national broadcast-media buying under a new unit to be headed by 28-year-old Peter Chrisanthopoulos.

Called RJR Nabisco Broadcast, the new unit of Ohlmeyer will handle $175 million in RJR Nabisco national broadcast billings, including network tv, broadcast syndication and cable. These billings were previously at Ohlmeyer Advertising, one of the five Ohlmeyer Communications operating divisions. Lowe Marschalk continues to handle an estimated $47 million in spot tv for brands that had been under the R.J. Reynolds Industries banner before its merger with Nabisco.

The creation of RJR Nabisco Broadcast represents a continuation of a trend that threatens the traditional agency-client relationship and the 15% commission. Ohlmeyer reportedly is taking a 3% commission on everything it buys on behalf of RJR Nabisco, leaving the affected brand agencies with 12%. Ohlmeyer declined comment on its commission rate.

"Many major advertisers—P&G/Richardson-Vicks, General Foods, RJR Nabisco, Bristol-Myers—now have internal media capabilities that effectively make them competitive to their agencies, and this is another one of those kind of things," said one agency executive who would not speak for attribution.

An analysis performed by the Newspaper Advertising Bureau indicates that P&G, Philip Morris Cos. and RJR Nabisco now account for 10% of all national advertising spending in the U.S.

Mr. Chrisanthopoulos, who

Theft, bribe cases surface at Ayer

By STEVEN W. COLFORD and CRAIG REISS

New York—John Bidus, a creative executive at N W Ayer since 1959, pleaded guilty last week to soliciting and receiving $60,000 in kickbacks from a production company in exchange for work on U.S. Army recruiting films that he produced.

The Bidus case was just part of a bad week for Ayer. The agency confirmed April 25 it has pressed embezzlement charges against two former clerks in its accounts payable department.

The size of the loss was not disclosed, but unconfirmed reports placed it at $230,000.

The Bidus case may become more significant if it is seized upon by congressional leaders who, before this case broke, already were moving to open an investigation into the way the military services award their ad contracts.

Mr. Bidus, 58, was fired April 21 from his vp-creative supervisor post after he told Ayer management he had been arrested Dec. 19 for allegedly having accepted $2,000 in marked bills from a supplier.

The money allegedly was forwarded by Sol Leyton, president of

Ohlmeyer forms RJR unit 1
Ohlmeyer Communications Cos., a joint venture between Don Ohlmeyer and RJR Nabisco, has consolidated all RJR Nabisco's national broadcast-media buying under a new unit called RJR Nabisco Broadcast. It will handle $175 million in RJR Nabisco national broadcast billings, including network tv, broadcast syndication and cable.

Coolers get spirited 1
Joseph E. Seagram & Sons is expected to introduce a line of spirit-based coolers with a name and packaging similar to its new Seagram's Golden Wine Cooler. Seagram is presenting its new spirit-based Seagram's Golden Spirits line to the trade in some Midwest and Florida markets for a probable summer introduction.

Ibuprofens unchained 3
A flood of new pain killers from big drug advertisers and generic houses is expected to hit the market this fall after American Home Products and Bristol-Myers lose their U.S. marketing exclusivities for over-the-counter ibuprofen-based analgesics.

U.S. car market in for shock 3
Car marketers from Romania, Greece, Taiwan, Spain, Czechoslovakia, Russia—and the only automobile manufacturer in Japan that has not yet entered the U.S.—are planning an early assault on the U.S. market. By 1990, the total number of players, including domestics and joint-venture companies, could be nearly 50. They could change the U.S. marketing environment.

Houston boom busting 6
Why are Houston marketers pessimistic? Oilpatch layoffs helped push the February unemployment rate to 9.6%. Analysts expect the jobless rate to reach 12% by summer as crude oil prices remain volatile. Retail sales are flat, but foreclosures on commercial and residential property aren't; they're running about 80% ahead of last year. Hotel occupancy has dropped to 52%, from 71% in 1980.

Nationwide under scrutiny 12
The U.S. Justice Department by yearend is expected to complete an initial investigation of Nationwide Advertising Service, the nation's largest recruitment agency, after allegations that it selectively overbilled clients for help-wanted ads.

Coke bottler faces suit 27
Co-op advertising exclusivities are at the center of an antitrust suit filed against Coca-Cola Bottling of Memphis. The suit was filed in Memphis last month by Mid-South Beverages, bottler of Pepsi-Cola and other soft drinks.

Putting a brand on clothes 28
Coca-Cola Co.'s decision last year to hang its brand name on casual clothes has prompted other national brand marketers to do the same, suggesting a trend toward product-as-personality.

Thinking big in Boston 36
There aren't too many rules about creating ads at Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos. In place of rules, they have enthusiasm and excitement. And there's not too much politics or turf-protection either. And there's no regional, small-time self-image; business feistiness is the counterpart to its internal enthusiasm. Thinking big, and as a result, creating provocative advertising that breaks through the present clutter of production-value slickness by being for and about real people has led the editors of Advertising Age to name HHCC Agency of the Year for 1985. See subsequent pages for other AA award winners.

Detente for marketing? 62
The Soviet Union is making what may be its first serious effort to learn Western marketing techniques. The U.S.S.R., a huge consumer market with no sophisticated advertising industry, and the American Management Assn.'s European division are talking about conducting marketing seminars to bring Soviet managers together with their Western counterparts.

Meet me in Vancouver 63
Organizers of Expo 86, a billion-dollar world's fair extravaganza in Vancouver, are hoping aggressive advertising and high-power corporate sponsorship will help it avoid the financial disasters that befell previous fairs in Knoxville and New Orleans. So far, big-name advertisers such as McDonald's International, Coca-Cola Ltd. and General Motors have signed on. In total, corporate sponsors plan to spend more than $57 million promoting their participation in the fair.

McCann-Erickson/New York's sudden dismissal last week of Curvin O'Rielly after only eight months as exec vp-creative director here was not as unexpected within as it was a surprise to outsiders.

"I had an inclination something was coming, but I didn't know what," Mr. O'Rielly said after getting word April 23 of the agency's decision. The "tone of the relationship. . .the general feeling" had changed, he added.

No successor has been named yet, and Mr. O'Rielly said he has no present plans, other than to stay on the East Coast.

Is Coke's No. 1 claim real thing?

By JERRY SCHWARTZ and NANCY GIGES

Atlanta—With Pepsi-Cola USA crying foul, Coca-Cola Co. said last week its boast that Coke Classic is back on top of the cola market is based not on sales but consumer research.

A Coca-Cola spokesman said internal research, conducted in March, had asked consumers "What did you drink yesterday?" When Coca-Cola president Donald Keough proclaimed Coke Classic is "once again the No. 1 cola in America" at the company's annual meeting (AA, April 21), he was basing the claim only on that query, not on share of market or sales.

A sales tax that would have hit California's tv commercial production companies was rejected 4-to-1 by the California state board of equalization last week. Had the board ratified the proposal, producers of commercials and industrial and education films would have been reclassified as "retailers" and made subject to a 6.5% tax (AA, Feb. 24). Otc ibuprofen leads the charge

New pain relievers abound

By NANCY GIGES

NEW YORK—A flood of new pain killers from big drug advertisers and generic houses is expected to hit the market this fall after American Home Products and Bristol-Myers lose their U.S. marketing exclusivities for over-the-counter ibuprofen-based analgesics.

Depending on each company's objectives, the introductions by major advertisers could be supported by spending exceeding $20 million for each brand, putting more pressure on acetaminophen-based Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol, still recovering from the decision to withdraw Tylenol capsules after a tampering incident (AA, Feb. 17, et seq.).

J&J, New Brunswick, N.J., already the market leader in the $1.7 billion analgesic category with Tylenol, has received approval from the Food & Drug Administration to sell an ibuprofen analgesic that would compete directly with AHP's Advil and B-M's Nuprin.

A J&J spokeswoman said if the company's McNeil Consumer Products Co. enters the market, the product would be called Medipren. She said no decision has been made whether to proceed after Sept. 24, when the exclusivity protection expires. The product has not been assigned to an agency, she said.

Other companies whose names have been mentioned as entering the fray include Sterling Drug, marketer of Bayer aspirin and Panadol acetaminophen, and Chattem, whose Pamprin and Premensyn PMS menstrual relief products have been hurt by directly competitive ad claims of the ibuprofen products. Neither company would comment on its plans.

The market also is expected to be bombarded by three increasingly aggressive generic drug houses, Bolar, Par Pharmaceuticals and Zenith Laboratories. These companies, which sell unadvertised drugs primarily on price, have become more sophisticated in their marketing practices and better accepted by the medical community, and thus by consumers.

The big losers are expected to be the aspirin brands, Sterling's Bayer, AHP's Anacin and B-M's Bufferin and Excedrin. Their market shares have been eroding since acetaminophen-based products and the newer ibuprofen ones have begun replacing aspirin as the ingredient of choice among consumers.

AHP and B-M, both New York-based, have had the otc ibuprofen segment of the market to themselves since the ingredient was approved for sale without prescription in 1984. AHP's Advil has captured 6% of the total analgesic market, while B-M's Nuprin has gained 2.5%.

ANPA vows action on advertiser needs

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

SAN FRANCISCO—The nation's newspapers appear poised for a new era of cooperation with advertisers, especially those placing business nationally.

As the American Newspaper Publishers Assn. celebrated its 100th year at its annual convention here April 19 to 23, its members wrestled with the future of the nation's largest advertising medium and its place in the media world of the 1990s.

Newspapers raked in $25 billion in ad revenues last year, outpacing tv, the No. 2 medium, by more than $4 billion.

A series of committees, acting under an umbrella group called the Future of Advertising Project, which is jointly sponsored by the ANPA and Newspaper Advertising Bureau, delivered their first reports since their formation last year.

"Even though many present conditions are quite positive, ever since the advent of television we have been slowly losing advertising market share and circulation penetration in many cities," said W. Thomas Johnson, publisher-ceo of Times Mirror Co.'s Los Angeles Times and the outgoing chairman of the NAB board.

"If we are to remain the nation's No. 1 advertising medium and if we are determined to improve our share of market, we simply must respond more aggressively and more creatively to the changing needs of our readers and our advertisers," Mr. Johnson said.

Separately, the NAB board last week elected Frank Daniels Jr., president-publisher of the Raleigh (N.C.) News & Observer and Times,

Sources said the sale, expected to be completed by the end of the year, will dramatically alter the French advertising scene by bringing to an end Havas' long-standing domination of the industry.

"Without the support of the government and the advantages it means for Havas, they cannot possibly maintain the enormous share of the advertising market they currently control," said a former Havas employe.

U.S. car market set for invasion

Players could reach 50

By RAYMOND SERAFIN

Car marketers from Romania, Greece, Taiwan, Spain, Czechoslovakia, Russia—and the only automobile manufacturer in Japan that has not yet entered the U.S.—are planning an early assault on the U.S. market.

Industry reports suggest up to 10 additional foreign-car companies could make their U.S. debut by 1990, bringing the total number of players, including domestics and joint-venture companies, to nearly 50.

The impact also could change the U.S. marketing environment.

Many marketers are redoubling their efforts to identify niches. Size, function and style will be as important as price in future niche marketing, sources believe. Some of the new marketers will aim at established-but-growing segments, such as utility trucks, two-seaters and sporty sedans, while others hope to create a demand for products as exotic as a $50,000 off-road vehicle.

"Eighteen months ago we were all saying that the industry was going from 25 to 12 companies in the world," said Gerald Greenwald, chairman of Chrysler Motors, the automotive operations group of Chrysler Corp. "Either we're going to get more competitiv. and there aren't going to be 50, or this is going to be a car market that looks dizzy."

Fierce competition in their home markets forces many foreign-based companies already here to rely on U.S. profits to fuel their research and development.

Japanese auto companies earned three-fourths of their 1984 worldwide profits in the U.S., said C.L. King, senior vp-sales for Nissan Motor Corp. USA, Carson, Cal.

New marketers are finding that existing dealers are lining up for franchises. "Most dealers are in an expansionist mood," said a spokesman for the National Automobile Dealers Assn. "They're interested in broadening their economic base and appealing to more

BK ad recall keeps fading

McDonald's still eclipses foes

By JULIE FRANZ

McDonald's has opened another front in the burger wars and appears to have chief rival Burger King off guard.

After McDonald's McD.L.T. campaign trounced Burger King's much-maligned "Find Herb" campaign in advertising top-of-mind awareness, BK has been looking for a way to fight back at the cash register and in consumer recall. It had better hurry.

BK's ad awareness score took a dive last month, as the four-month "Herb" effort ended, dropping 7.7 percentage points to 15.3% of first mentions, according to ADVERTISING AGE's monthly adWatch survey of advertising awareness. McDonald's awareness score, on the other hand, gained 2.8 percentage points. Last month, 42.4% of the respondents asked to name the advertising for a fast-food restaurant that came to mind first said McDonald's.

AdWatch is a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of product categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In March, 1,000 adults were questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

McDonald's in March shifted its advertising focus to its breakfast menu, which accounts for about 20% of sales. The ads, via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, focus on the products' convenience, using the theme "Takin' breakfast by the hand." Similar ads via Burrell Advertising, Chicago, themed "Portable breakfast," are aimed at the black community.

Breakfast spots for Burger King broke in April, after the March adWatch survey had been completed.

BK also is running spots for its new Chicken Tenders, a chicken finger food aimed at stealing share from McDonald's Chicken McNuggets.

Rounding out the fast-food category in third place was Wendy's with 8.8% of first mentions; Hardee's finished in the No. 4 spot with 3.7%, and Pizza Hut's 1.4% of first mentions took fifth.

Despite the ad dollars, a significant percentage of respondents last month came up dry when asked which restaurant advertisement they recalled first: 17.3% of those queried responded "None" or "Don't know."

It may take another month for new advertising from Coca-Cola and Pepsi, the leading soft-drink marketers, to affect ad awareness scores in that category. New campaigns from both brands broke just before the March adWatch survey period, but too early to affect last month's outcome significantly.

Pepsi remains in the lead for the second month among soft-drink brands, with Coke again filling the No. 2 slot. Pepsi's share of first mentions rose slightly (and statistically insignificantly) to 33.5%, while Coke's score similarly inched up to 31.7%.

The 10 best recalled (unaided) ads in March were for, in descending order, Coca-Cola, Pepsi, McDonald's, Burger King, Budweiser/Bud Light, Miller/Miller Lite, Ford, Sports Illustrated, Chevrolet and Procter & Gamble's Pampers.

Grocery Marketing

Supermarket chains work to fill tall order

By Julie Liesse Erickson

The next few years will determine if the retail grocery industry can have its cake and eat it too.

Or, more accurately, supermarket operators will find if they can have upscale perishables alongside low-price dry groceries.

"In the 1950s and 1960s, a chain would create its prototype and open that cookie-cutter store all over its market," says Tim Hammonds, senior vp for the Food Marketing Institute, Washington. "In the '70s and early '80s, we saw the emergence of distinct formats—warehouse stores, gourmet stores, superstores.

"Now we are seeing the formats beginning to blend. Everyone's trying to provide warehouse-style dry groceries with upscale perishables."

It's a risky move for the conservative supermarket industry, which traditionally operates on slim profit margins. (Progressive Grocer magazine places the average supermarket's pretax profit at 1.8% in 1985.) But with U.S. population growth slowing and competition coming from everyone—from fast food to department stores to small specialty shops—retail grocers, particularly chains, more than ever need to meet the very specific needs of their customers on a market-by-market basis.

1985 total supermarket sales $209.8 billion

FMI, a trade association with 1,500 corporate members representing 18,000 retail outlets around the world, places 1985 industry sales at $290 billion, up marginally from the previous year. Progressive Grocer magazine figures an industrywide sales increase of 4.6% from 1984 to 1985.

Unlike some of its prime competitors for the consumer's food dollar—fast food and convenience stores, for example—the supermarket industry remains outside true chain domination. Figures from the U.S. Department of Agriculture show chains' share of grocery store dollars has remained virtually unchanged for 20 years. Progressive Grocer reports chains accounted for

49.4% of all U.S. food store sales in 1985—but 11.4% of the total number of retail food outlets. There are 154,000 food outlets in the U.S.; 30,500 of those are supermarkets.

The chain operator does have the advantage of a large base of capital. "It used to be that you could open a grocery store with very little capital of your own," says Ken Partch, editor and publication director for Supermarket Business, a Fieldmark Media publication based in New York. "That's just not true today. You need $5 million to $6 million, at the [high end], to open a superstore."

But although Progressive Grocer reports 64% of the nation's supermarket chains opened a new store in 1985, "All the big chains are looking at slower growth in an overstored environment," says Frank Pankyo, vp for the Food Institute, Fair Lawn, N.J. "Each chain is looking for a way to break out of the mold—into related fields, into a broader range of goods, including videocassette rental, lawn and garden equipment, liquor, expanded produce and restaurants.

"The ultimate question," he says, "is who is going to supply the needs of the American household?"

To be all things to all people, upscale chains, such as 33-store Randall's in Houston and 127-store Ralphs in Los Angeles, are trying to re-establish themselves as competitively priced. Meanwhile, chains that have made a living by advertising low prices and no-frills service, including Dublin, Cal.-based Lucky Stores and Elmwood Park, N.Y.-based Grand Union Co., are adding on-site bakeries and upscale meat departments. And it's almost taken for granted that each store will feature a selection of non-food departments: Pharmacies, floral shops, banking facilities and the like.

But Mr. Hammonds says it's not true that all supermarkets are destined to look alike. He points to another popular industry trend, what he calls "customizing for the neighborhood"; Safeway Stores, Oakland, Cal., for example, boasts of more than a dozen store formats.

"Where the stores will look different is in the size of their product selection and types of foods each offers," Mr. Hammonds says. "The U.S. is experiencing a celebration of ethnic diversity that isn't going to end soon."

New kinds of in-store service departments also will yield variety—thankfully, according to some observers. "The biggest event of the '80s is that service has come back to the supermarket," Mr. Partch says. "They reacted just in time—supermarkets had become very dull places to shop. There was a terrible sameness from coast to coast."

But although customizing will make stores more responsive to market conditions, it also will make the chain's job more difficult. "There was a time when you could open a grocery store and expect to be successful," says Larry Schaeffer, editorial director for Progressive Grocer, a Maclean Hunter Media trade publication based in Stamford, Conn. "Today, you have to make sure each store is positioned properly in its particular market.

"Niche marketing may be a cliche, but it's an accurate one."

In addition, Mr. Hammonds says, "Markets are very different. It's not enough to customize once."

But the traditional strength of a chain is producing similar stores over and over—of having a brand name that elicits certain expectations in the customer's mind. Can chains customize and still remain profitable? "The jury is still out on the flexibility of the chains," Mr. Hammonds says. "How do you manage different formats? Do you use the same name, the same management groups?

"The climate today requires that a very clear and consistent image be projected to consumers—and how do you manage that when you operate several different formats?"

"A customer wants to go to a Kroger or a Safeway and know what to expect," says Charles Handy, director of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's food distribution and marketing research section in Washington.

To clear up confusion over multiple formats under a single chain operator, Mr. Hammonds and others suggest the possibility of multiple brand names or a set of smaller chains under one corporate banner. Some chains already have experience with similar setups: American Stores Co. of Salt Lake City has four separate supermarket divisions, while others, including Giant Food of Landover, Md., operate distinctly different outlets under separate names.

Continuing image advertising campaigns is another way to let customers know what to expect. "Price advertising will always be the key in the supermarket industry, but image ads are getting people in your door," says Mark Pryor, editor of Food People, a trade publication covering the southern supermarket business from its Atlanta headquarters.

In early April, Winn-Dixie Stores of Jacksonville, Fla., for example, broke a new tv campaign designed to promote its stores' variety of products and how those products fit into individual shoppers' lives. The campaign represents a major change from the previous more generic, price-oriented ads.

Giant Food, Landover, Md., last fall introduced a series of tv spots that clearly shows customers what they'll find at Giant stores: Fresh fruits, vegetables and meats, plus concerned service and followups to customer comments.

These types of image campaigns reflect broader changes in supermarket advertising.

Supermarkets are tilting their media buys toward more tv ads, and, says Mr. Pryor, this might be at the expense of newspapers. Progessive Grocer reports 52% of chain supermarket managers in an early 1986 survey said their use of tv advertising was increasing; only 5% said they were using less tv. And while the magazine reported that only 6% of independent grocers were decreasing their use of tv ads, 11% said they were decreasing their use of newspaper ads.

In addition, Mr. Hammonds says, "The supermarket industry is moving away from manufacturer-driven advertising and toward customer-driven ads. Formerly, supermarket ads were driven by manufacturer allowances, or payments to retailers—resulting in the tombstone ad, with line after line of product names.

"Now you see local ads tailored to shoppers—more store image, more information, more general health and nutrition information.

"Increasingly, ads also feature just a few products, rather than the endless lists of yesteryear," Mr. Hammonds says.

This reflects what he calls "a more equal partnership emerging between manufacturers and retailers. In the past," he says, "customer demand was primarily created by manufacturers, with retailers the vehicle for that demand. Today, because of the information the retailer has and because the stores themselves have an image with consumers, the retailer has become an important consumer for the manufacturer."

Mr. Panyko is more direct. "Today, the flow of power is toward the wholesaler and retailer and away from the manufacturer. "With overstocked stores and scanning systems, the store has the information and the leverage."

But Mr. Handy points out that independent supermarkets have shared this new power with chain operators. "Big wholesalers like SuperValu and Wetterau have given the independent the same buying power and economies that chains have enjoyed," he says. "They provide independents with some of the support services usually found in a chain. And with the independent's lower labor cost, they have a big advantage."

"The relationship between manufacturers and retailers is fundamentally a very cooperative one," says Richard Bryan, vp of Glendinning Associates, Stamford, Conn.-based marketing consultants. "They know they have to work together to get products through the distribution system and out to consumers.

"But it's also an adversarial relationship," Mr. Bryan says. "The manufacturer wants to own the consumer's loyalty for his products, and the retailer wants the consumer to be loyal to his stores. There have been times when manufacturers had the upper hand, but that's not going on any more.

"Retailers, particularly the chains, definitely have strengthened their position."

buyer segments."

Domestic auto marketers are trying to meet the competition by turning to "captive imports"—cars built by foreign companies for marketing here by domestic companies—from Japan, Germany and Mexico, and joint ventures with foreign-based companies, efforts that are blurring distinctions between domestics and imports.

The niche that many car marketers are looking to fill in the U.S. is the low end, a market segment that includes the 20 million people a year who now buy used cars at an average price of $5,200.

Leading a wave of new, low-end cars into the U.S. is the $3,990 Yugo, a car imported to fill the niche abandoned by the Japanese, who responded to import quotas by moving into higher segments of the market.

The Yugo ad strategy, via Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson, New York, attempts to position the car as a successor to the Ford Model T and Volkswagen Beetle, with the price tag a start on "the road back to sanity," according to the ads (AA, Aug. 26).

To tap this low-end market, Suzuki of America Automotive Corp., Brea, Cal., began selling the $6,200 Samurai, a jeep-like subcompact, on the West Coast in November (AA, July 8). Its Japanese parent, Suzuki Motor Co. Ltd., makes the three-cylinder Sprint for General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet division.

Suzuki also plans to bring into the U.S. a version of the car for its own dealer network in 1988. The agency is Keye/Donna/Pearlstein, Los Angeles.

But some in the industry already are predicting that Hyundai Corp. and other Korean companies will dominate the low-end market in the same way that Japanese makers established themselves during the 1970s.

"I think the Japanese will resign the subcompact market to the Koreans," said Jim Harbour, president of Harbour & Associates, Detroit, a manufacturing management consultant.

U.S. importer Hyundai Motor America, Garden Grove, Cal., introduced the $4,995 Excel in February with a network of dealers in 31 states on the two coasts and through the Sunbelt, with a sales goal of 100,000 units in 1986. In March, the company's first full month, it sold 10,342 cars.

That one-month figure surpasses the total of 10,326 cars sold by Yugo since its August introduction through March. "We're still restricted by supply," said Dan Prior, senior vp-sales marketing for Yugo. "We have about 30,000 purchase orders unfilled."

One distinction between the two new importers is that Hyundai opened its U.S. marketing with nine versions of its Excel at different price levels, while Yugo entered the U.S. with only the Yugo GV, but plans to bring in three new models, including a two-seat sports car, by 1990.

Some contend that pricing of the new cars is deceptive. Options can add up to $1,000 to Yugo's $3,990 price, and transportation charges, dealer prep, taxes and title can bring the out-the-door cost to the mid-$5,000s. Early excitement about the product, coupled with its general unavailability, led some dealers to mark up the price several hundred more dollars.

Hyundai's entry was patterned after the typical Japanese strategy of offering a price leader that is not always readily available. While the four-speed manual transmission, five-door hatchback Excel comes

Auto ad accounts moving fast

By JESSE SNYDER

DETROIT—Automobile accounts are up for grabs. Nearly $200 million in accounts has changed hands since November, and more changes may be coming.

Slowing sales and production overcapacity in the U.S. and Europe, a surge of new import entries in the U.S. market and account conflicts from the increasing number of international agency mergers all have contributed to accounts shifting.

"Some auto makers are repositioning and want fresh blood, some agencies are tempted to bail out on weak clients and some marketing executives who missed sales goals are under more pressure to produce," said one agency source. "It's sometimes easier to hire a [new] agency than take the rap yourself."

Domestic car makers are least affected, but U.S. ad shops are right in the thick of the action. Heightened competition also is putting a premium on agency executives with strong auto credentials and creating new opportunities for them.

HCM/New York is the most recent winner in the car-account sweepstakes, picking up the $15 million Peugeot Motors of America national account in competition against Angotti Thomas Hedge and Lord, Geller, Federico Einstein (AA, April 7). HCM already represents the French auto maker in nine other countries, including France.

The agency will pursue dealer group accounts that did not automatically come with the award from Peugeot's Lyndhurst, N.J.-based U.S. arm, says HCM president Robert Schmitterer.

Mr. Schmitterer added: "Great creative agencies are often built on great automotive accounts."

HCM replaces Ogilvy & Mather, which resigned Peugeot to pursue another car account, that Peugeot insiders say is Nissan but which Nissan and O&M deny.

For its part, HCM dumped Italian auto maker Alfa Romeo to pitch and win Peugeot. Both actions, observers say, reflect agency desires to move up in billings or prestige—another factor that is feeding the action here and abroad.

The current car-account shuffle began last fall, when American Motors Corp. pulled its $50 million AMC-Renault account from Grey Advertising and gave it to Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, Southfield, Mich., which already had AMC's $60 million Jeep account. Grey went on to win the $37 million Mitsubishi Motor Sales account away from Cunningham & Walsh.

In addition, executives at Dai Ichi Kikaku, a big Japanese agency partly owned by Mitsubishi Motor's parent company, now say they are going after the account in the U.S.

Jaguar Cars, Leonia, N.J., is looking for a new agency for its $16 million-to-$20 million U.S. account because of a client conflict at incumbent Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt (AA, March 13).

The agency already handles Chrysler-Plymouth, which plans to begin marketing a Maserati-built Chrysler $25,000 two-seater in early 1987.

And Alfa Romeo, which already has cleaned house, still is looking for an agency for its $15 million pan-European account. It replaced Marshall Advertising, a London subsidiary of DMB&B, with Swiss-based GGK, London, on the $3 million U.K. account and split the $15 million Italian account between Alberto Cremona, ODC and Mac. CBC previously handled.

In the U.S., Alfa picked Bloom to handle the account HCM resigned. The car maker says the account will grow to $8 million or $10 million with a new sedan being introduced; HCM has described it as a $2 million account.

Last month, Young & Rubicam won $40 million in billings for Ford of Germany, Cologne, replacing incumbent J. Walter Thompson Co., and General Motors' subsidiary Adam Opel moved its $24 million-to-$26 million German account from McCann-Erickson to fellow Interpublic Group shop Troost Lowe-Marschalk without a formal review.

Y&R also is gunning for the $30 million Ford account in the U.K., now at O&M (AA, April 7).

The only real crack on the domestic front was forced in early 1984 by Vic Olesen & Partners, Los Angeles, which won a $10 million California-only Chevrolet account from Campbell-Ewald.

The active market is opening doors for agency executives with strong automotive account records.

Among recent personnel shifts: Joe Schulte, head of JWT/USA's Detroit office, recently moved to New York, where he will oversee parent J. Walter Thompson Co.'s worldwide Ford business; Willie Hopkins, top-level account supervisor on Audi at Doyle Dane Bernbach, Troy, Mich., heading up a new Los Angeles office for Backer & Spielvogel on Hyundai, Korea's entry into U.S. markets, and Dick Johnson, head creative on Dodge trucks at BBDO, Southfield, Mich., to head creative at S&SC, Southfield, Mich.

Many shops, however, seem oblivious to the turmoil. Campbell-Ewald is celebrating 75 years with Chevy this year and D'Arcy or its predecessor has now held tight to Cadillac and Pontiac accounts for more than 50 years. They've outlasted the seven-year norm in an industry that seems to be getting the itch more and more frequently.

in at $4,995, the price escalates to $5,895 for the next lowest-price version (with a five-speed manual transmission) and to $6,915 for the Excel GLS four-door sedan with automatic transmission. Options can add another $1,400. With freight, title and taxes, plus dealer markups that are common in many West Coast markets, it can cost up to $10,000 to take an Excel out the door.

Jack Collins, director of marketing, said Hyundai sees the sale of low-end cars as "fundamentally incremental to the marketplace.

"The opportunity is evident for entry-level autos because of the escalation of prices in general. We're just not sure how deep the water is."

J.D. Power & Associates, Westlake Village, Cal., predicts the market for low-end vehicles (less than $5,500, based on current dollar value) will reach 800,000 to 1 million by 1990. Yugo officials suggested the number could go as high as 1.5 million by then.

The crowding of the marketplace is affecting attempts to position the cars.

A J.D. Power study said, "With so many alternatives from which to choose, the consumer will be seeking information that will simplify a complex decision process involving the expenditure of a great deal of money. Each manufacturer will be increasingly competing for attention during a time when image, reputation and value will be more important to consumers," the report said.

Mr. Collins said Hyundai approached its ad campaign with the conviction that "the Korean heritage is not a liability. It's not that Korea has a bad image, but that it has no image." Excel's Korean heritage isn't mentioned in the current campaign, via Backer & Spielvogel, Huntington Beach, Cal., which uses the theme line "Hyundai. Cars that make sense" (AA, Jan. 20).

Hyundai preintroductory advertising tried to build corporate credibility and pique consumer interest by focusing on the company's international standing in the shipbuilding and locomotive manufacturing industries.

While most Americans hadn't heard of Hyundai Corp., it is South Korea's largest company, and the 37th-largest multinational conglomerate worldwide.

Others bringing low-end vehicles to the U.S. market have not indicated yet how those cars will be positioned:

- Inthelco, a West German company, is building the utility vehicle Desta in Greece, using Ford of Europe components, although production eventually is to be moved to Germany. Six models, starting at $4,990, will be introduced on the East Coast in mid-June by Desta of America (East), Bricktown, N.J., the first distributor appointed by importer Automotive Imports & Marketing, Phoenix. Sales goal is 20,000 to 25,000 units the first year, with an eventual objective of more than 100,000. Goldsmith & Ansorge, Red Bank, N.J., handles.
- Daihatsu Motor Co., the only one of Japan's nine auto manufacturers not yet in the U.S. market, plans to begin exporting its minicar, the Charade, in the fall of 1987 (AA, July 11). The front-wheel-drive Charade is sold in two-door and four-door hatchback versions in Japan. Daihatsu is expected to set up a subsidiary, Daihatsu of America, on the West Coast that will begin establishing a marketing network later this year. No agency has been selected.
- Volkswagen United States will try to recapture the entry-level market that its Beetle once dominated by importing two VW-made entry-level models from Brazil for the 1987 model year. Doyle Dane Bernbach, Troy, Mich., handles.
- Czechoslovakian maker Skoda has marketed a minicar in Canada since 1983 and is reportedly considering entering the U.S.
- Romanian maker Auto Dacia is considering entry with one or more models, but three separate companies claim import rights, according to the trade journal Automotive News.
- Spanish car maker Seat (SAY-aht) is weighing entry of a low-cost car line. It also plans to bring in a sporty small car to compete with models such as the Honda Civic CRX by late 1988 or early 1989. That may be affected by its agreement to be acquired by Volkswagen AG, Wolfsburg, West Germany (AA, March 10).

While price is expected to be a part of the positioning of those vehicles, value probably will be even more important. Various studies suggest that most consumers, especially women (who on average buy smaller and lower-price cars than men do), are willing to pay slightly higher prices for increased reliability.

There is more activity at the upper end of the car market as well.

The Sterling, a collaborative project between Honda Motor Co. of Japan and the U.K.'s Austin Rover Group, will compete with $20,000-plus luxury sedans when it is introduced in the U.S. in 1987. Steyr-Daimler-Puch A.G., Austria, is building a national dealer organization for its $50,000-plus Pinzgauer, a five-passenger off-road vehicle scheduled to debut on the East Coast in late summer.

While the bottom end of the car market is price-driven, "at the upper end it's really a question of value retention," said Raymond Ketchledge, president, Austin Rover Cars of North America, Miami, which will import the Sterling to the U.S. beginning in January.

Mr. Ketchledge said Austin Rover received 600 applications for its 100 dealerships. "The level of interest is high, because this is a market segment that is expanding very dramatically," he said. "And the domestics have not succeeded in appealing to younger, affluent buyers."

Unlike Yugo, Suzuki and Hyundai, which began with regional distribution in the U.S. market, Austin Rover intends a national launch, Mr. Ketchledge said. "We want to provide a high level of customer assurance that we will be around for a long time and that they will be able to get service anywhere they travel," he said.

Sales goal is 20,000 to 22,000 units the first year. Beber Silverstein & Partners, Miami, handles the $20 million account.

French auto maker Citroen, which left the U.S. market more than a decade ago, is reportedly considering a return within a few years with its own new entry in the luxury-sedan category.

At $50,000, the Pinzgauer is being aimed at high-income sportsmen. Pinzgauer of America, Teleford, Pa., distributor for Austria's Steyr-Daimler-Puch, A.G., hopes to sell 500 of the all-terrain sports-utility vehicles beginning this summer and double that in 1987. There is no agency yet.

Even the Russians want a piece of the action. The Soviets are considering bringing their front-wheel-drive Lada to the U.S. in two years after testing the demand for it in Canada and Europe this summer (AA, Feb. 24). The base price is $7,000 (Canadian) in Canada.

All this activity will accelerate an industry trend toward fewer dealers, with the remaining ones more likely to carry several lines of products in separate showrooms. About 4,000 dealerships were closed during the down days of the industry in the early 1980s. The rate of decline has slowed in more recent years, and there were 24,750 U.S. dealers at the end of 1985.

Potential franchisees are lining up despite costly demands made by producers. When Honda created its new Acura division to enter the luxury-performance market, it demanded that its 50 start-up dealers ouild facilities at least 10 miles from their existing Honda dealerships. Hyundai required that its dealers provide separate showrooms on sites near interstate highways. Those sorts of demands favor representation by the wealthiest dealers, who thus continue to grow.

Auto analyst Maryann Keller, of Vilas-Fischer Associates Ltd., New York, said, "The success of the new marketers will hinge on the same things that determine success now: How the car holds up, who has the best dealer network and service system."#

Citizen elects midprice niche

By LISA E. PHILLIPS

NEW YORK—Citizen Watch Co. of America last week broke its biggest U.S. campaign, a $15 million effort that will appear in an unusual arena for wristwatches: ABC-TV's "Wide World of Sports 25th Anniversary Special" (AA, April 21).

That kicks off Citizen's charge into the U.S. midprice watch market, dominated by Tokyo-based K. Hattori Corp.'s Lorus, Pulsar and Seiko brands, which have a combined market share exceeding 70%.

Citizen, via Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, signed a $4 million deal this year for sponsorship of ABC sports events including th Kentucky Derby, Preakness, Indi anapolis 500 and 11 "Monday Nigh Football" games.

It also will be a network sponso of nine consecutive National Foot ball League football games o CBS-TV, beginning Nov. 11, an es timated $3.5 million buy.

A spring spot buy in more than 50 markets will increase for a fal gift-giving push because about 60% of watch purchases are gifts, said Steve Schindler, senior vp-management rep at the agency.

Even though more women than men buy watches, Citizen opted for sports events. "Sports programs tested better [recall] than prime time shows," said Tony DeGregorio, senior vp-associate creative director.

While any company not touting beer, razors, shaving cream or automobiles would stand out on tv sports shows, Citizen's new campaign is meant to stand out in the midprice $50-to-$300 segment.

Both spots in the new campaign, created by Mr. DeGregorio and Lee Garfinkel, senior vp-associate creative director-copywriter, show off several dress watches interspersed among quick-cut vignettes of beautiful, active people getting dressed for evening dates.

The action in each spot is backed by an Al Jolson imitator singing the 1920s song "About a Quarter to Nine" as men and women hurriedly go through their closets, change outfits and check their Citizen watches.

Voiceover on both spots proclaims: "They say time is what you make it. At Citizen, we prefer to make it beautiful." The commercials end with a logo and the tag line "Citizen. No other watch expresses time as beautifully."

Steve Horn, ADVERTISING AGE's 1985 Director of the Year, directed the Citizen spots and David Dee edited. Robert Nelson, senior vp-executive producer at LHS&B, produced; Mr. DeGregorio was art director, and Mr. Garfinkel, copywriter.#

Publication's ad revenue ruled taxable

Nonprofits lose tax battle

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court last week left only a slight opening for nonprofit publishers to escape paying taxes on advertising revenues, but Congress may slam the door shut later this year.

In a ruling eagerly anticipated by both for-profit publishers and nonprofits (AA, Dec. 16), the justices unanimously overturned a lower court decision and ordered the tax-exempt American College of Physicians, Philadelphia, to pay taxes on ad revenue generated by its monthly magazine, Annals of Internal Medicine.

By rejecting the lower court's interpretation of a 1950 tax law, the justices pushed aside the argument that advertising in Annals should be tax-exempt because it directly furthered ACP's not-for-profit mission, the education of its 75,000 physician members.

Although the court declared ad income from Annals to be taxable, it did not accept the government's position that existing laws made ad revenues of all not-for-profit organizations taxable.

Writing for the court, Justice Thurgood Marshall left open the possibility that, with proper packaging, advertising in Annals might be judged educational and its revenue tax-exempt.

"By coordinating the content of the advertisements with the editorial content of the issue, or by publishing only advertisements reflecting new developments in the pharmaceutical market, for example, perhaps the college could satisfy the stringent standards erected by Congress and the Treasury," he said.

For-profit publishers, often locked in tough competitive battles with publications of nonprofit groups, have long contended that sheltering the income of professional and association publications from taxation gives those publishers an unfair advantage.

A House ways and means committee panel expects to review tax treatment of "unrelated business income" earned by nonprofits at hearings this year.

The significance of the ACP case was underscored by the interest in the case from the American Society of Assn. Executives here. If Annals' ad revenues had been found to be tax-exempt, the ASAE was prepared to ask that ad revenues from publications by its thousands of nonprofit member associations also be exempted.

The Supreme Court offers little encouragement to ASAE members, conceded James Albertine, director of government affairs. "I don't think the decision forecloses on the possibility that one can get an issue of relatedness [of advertising and the publication's educational, tax-exempt purpose] worked out," he said, "but it doesn't look all that great."

William O'Donnell, exec vp at the Assn. of Business Publishers, New York, which represents for-profit publications, said he believes the court ruling closes the issue.#

N.Y. poster trucks gear up

By LISA E. PHILLIPS

NEW YORK—Another fleet of trucks sporting standard outdoor-board-size posters takes to the streets of New York May 1, despite a vow by the city's transportation commissioner to ticket any vehicle obstructing or distracting traffic.

PosterMotion will have six trucks in New York, said Andrew Motion, president of the London-based company, and his standard 30-sheet-panel trucks also will arrive in Los Angeles by mid-June and in Chicago, San Francisco and Washington by October.

PM's trucks carry three panels—two concave, 10-by-22.8-ft. panels and one odd-size panel in the rear—all externally illuminated for 24-hour visibility.

They will be equipped with cellular telephones, in case an advertiser wants to change a driver's route. PM already has three advertisers lined up for May 1 and beyond, Mr. Motion said, though he declined to identify.

PosterMotion will be competing in New York against Vehicle Displays' Prestige Panels Inc. division, which currently has three trucks operating in New York, and Wheeler Inc. (AA, April 7). PM's rates match PPI's—$2,000 a week. Wheeler's 10 trucks cost $1,000 a week.

New York's transportation department has been getting complaints from drivers about the board-carrying trucks, which are "wider than a single lane" and refuse to travel faster than "two miles per hour" in Manhattan traffic, said Gregory Perrin, a spokesman for the department.

Tickets have been issued to drivers of those trucks, Mr. Perrin said.

A spokesman for Chicago's law department said that city has no laws against vehicles carrying advertising along city streets, "as long as they stay off boulevards"—such as Michigan Avenue and Lake Shore Drive—that are zoned against commercial traffic.#

among the top 10 was a first for the magazine. Its "Catch the feeling" tv campaign attempts to put viewers in sports figures' shoes and has succeeded at the difficult task of making a lasting impression.

Nearly six out of ten respondents asked to name the first advertising in any category that came to mind couldn't recall any or answered "Don't know."

That includes 41% of those age 18 to 24 and 78% of respondents age 65 or older.

Among significant changes in other categories last month:

- Tylenol pain reliever dropped off the list of top-10 best recalled ads, but gained another three percentage points in the medicine and drug category. Tylenol's share of first mentions is now at 36.7%, its highest score ever. That follows the latest product-tampering incident that forced maker Johnson & Johnson to pull the product from the market and replace Tylenol capsules with caplets. Advil remains second with 5% of first mentions; Bayer is third with a 3.3% share.
- Trans World Airlines definitely is "leading the way" with its new campaign focusing on its foreign service. The carrier's share of first mentions in the airline category rose 6.1 percentage points, tying it for first place in first mentions at 13.4% with Eastern. United, second last month, drops to third with 12.6% of first mentions.

TWA's awareness gain came before the extensive news coverage that followed the explosion of a terrorist bomb aboard one of its jets flying between Rome and Athens.#

For the Record

BBDO INTERNATIONAL, New York, reports first-quarter net income rose 16% to $4.9 million, as worldwide revenues gained 8% to $81.6 million. International revenues spurted 26% as U.S. revenues rose only 3%.

PIONEER ELECTRONICS CORP., Long Beach, Cal., has consolidated its $10 million-to-$12 million account at Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, Torrance, which previously handled only Pioneer audio products. The video portion had been at Altschiller Reitzfeld, New York.

SARA LEE CORP., Chicago, last week moved the $7 million creative portion of its Hillshire Farm smoked sausage account to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles from Venet Advertising, New York, after a five-month review. Sive & Associates, Cincinnati, handles media placement.

JAGUAR CARS, Leonia, N.J., will back the June introduction of a limited-edition convertible version of its XJS V-12 touring coupe with a print campaign in upscale magazines. The effort will be the swan song for Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York, which is leaving Jaguar because of a client conflict with Chrysler Corp. (AA, March 13). Jaguar is searching for a new agency for its $16 million-to-$20 million account but hasn't yet narrowed a broad list of applicants to finalists.

KETCHUM COMMUNICATIONS, Pittsburgh, is "rather constantly" considering Chicago, among other markets, for expansion, said chairman-ceo William Genge. He would neither confirm nor deny reports that Ketchum officials have met with Tatham-Laird & Kudner executives to discuss a possible buyout but said there was "nothing red-hot going on between Ketchum and anybody in Chicago."

DANCER FITZGERALD SAMPLE, New York, will close its five-person Minneapolis office after completing its work on the $25 million Republic Airlines account. Republic plans to be acquired for $884 million by St. Paul-based Northwest Orient Airlines, which will consolidate the combined account at its agency, Grey Advertising, New York (AA, March 31).

ALL BRAND IMPORTERS, New York, on May 1 breaks its first tv campaign for Foster's Australian Lager. It features actor-comedian Paul Hogan, star of the Australian tourism commercials. The $3 million effort starts in Los Angeles, with additional markets planned for January. Diener Hauser Bates, Los Angeles, handles, in conjunction with George Patterson Ltd., Melbourne, producer.

DART & KRAFT'S Kraft subsidiary, Glenview, Ill., on April 21 broke a $3 million tv and couponing campaign, featuring Sid Caesar, for its Light N' Lively cottage cheese. Ads for Light N' Lively ice milk and yogurt break May 21. Geers Gross, New York, handles.

KELLOGG CO., Battle Creek, Mich., will not halt advertising for its Just Right cereal in the wake of a product recall last week. Metal shards, later discovered to be from a construction site near the assembly line, had been found in boxes of the cereal. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles.

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION has barred Figgie International, Richmond, Va., from making false safety claims for its Vanguard heat detector. The FTC ruled that point-of-purchase materials falsely claimed the Vanguard provides earlier warnings than smoke detectors and adequate time for escape. Figgie denied making false claims but has not yet decided whether to appeal. Dix & Eaton, Cleveland, handles Figgie.

YOO-HOO CHOCOLATE BEVERAGE CORP., Carlstadt, N.J., has won a preliminary round in its suit against A.J. Canfield Co., Chicago, over exclusive use of the term "chocolate fudge" in soft-drink packaging (AA, March 24). A U.S. district court judge in Newark has ruled in a bench opinion that the term "describes a taste or flavor" and no company should be granted the right to its exclusive use. A court date has yet to be set.

CHRYSLER CORP.'S Chrysler-Plymouth division, Highland Park, Mich., has bought what it calls the first-ever automotive ad package for thoroughbred horse-racing's Triple Crown, which starts May 3 with the Kentucky Derby. C-P bought four spots for the Derby and three each for the Preakness on May 17 and Belmont Stakes on June 7, all on ABC-TV. Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Birmingham, Mich., handles. Also, Chrysler Corp. will sponsor the inaugural Chrysler Cup Senior PGA tournament, matching eight U.S. golfers against a team of international players, Sept. 4 to 7. ABC will televise the final two rounds.

TELEVISION AUDIENCE ASSESSMENT, Boston, last week suspended its year-old qualitative tv rating service "until additional investment capital is secured," said TAA president Rolf Wulfsberg. In its final report, on daytime tv, TAA said its findings confirmed that "audience involvement with programs. . .enhances commercial effectiveness."

LBS COMMUNICATIONS, New York, has "major" expansion plans, going well beyond barter tv syndication. Paul Siegel, president of the LBS Enterprises division, will start Kideo Matinee to co-produce and market children's theatrical movies. LBS exec vp John Bohach will expand acquisition and marketing of home video titles, manage character licensing and head international tv barter sales. Senior vp-strategic planning Caroline Vanderlip will pursue direct-response marketing of video titles and opportunities in publishing and pay tv/cable/in-flight program sales.

WORTH NOTING: C. Scott Rombach to vp-corporate relations, a new post at Campbell Soup Co., Camden, N.J., from pr director. . .July Guerin De Neco, who has served on a volunteer basis as president and chairman of the Advertising Club of New York, has been named to the new post of executive director of the adclub and of the Advertising Club of New York Foundation, from head of Judy Guerin Public Relations/Advertising for the past 16 years. . .Frank J. Corbett Inc., Chicago, has formed FJC Hospital Group. The unit already bills $8 million from St. Joseph Hospital, Phoenix, and Weiss Memorial Hospital, Chicago. . .Shareholders have approved RJR Nabisco as the new name of R.J. Bates OKs Saatchi talks

Fallout from BBDO megadeal: $180M departs

By STEWART ALTER

The expected ripple effect from BBDO International's stunning deal with Doyle Dane Bernbach Group and Needham Harper Worldwide (AA, April 28) quickly materialized last week, and dramatically plunged the agency business into a new era.

The superdeal, more significant because of the deeper industry changes it reflects than its impact on ad agency rankings, was followed quickly by a shift in Ted Bates Worldwide's position on a deal with Saatchi & Saatchi Co. that could immediately create the world's biggest agency group with $7.5 billion in billings—or 50% more than BBDO/DDB/Needham, assuming no client departures due to conflicts.

Saatchi, rebuffed when it presented its proposal to buy DDB at the same meeting in which the DDB board decided to go instead with BBDO and Needham, apparently wasted no time in returning to Bates.

Robert Jacoby, chairman of Bates Worldwide, which has $3.1 billion in billings, confirmed May 1 not only that Saatchi had approached him again last week, but that he is willing to talk. "They've expressed an interest in resuming negotiations and we will do so," Mr. Jacoby said through a spokeswoman.

There also were rumors—widespread in the industry but dismissed as "crazy" by Mr. Jacoby—that Bates was exploring a deal, possibly a sale, to Dentsu Inc., the Japan-based giant with $3.6 billion in billings whose only major presence outside Japan is a joint venture, DYR, with Young & Rubicam.

While Mr. Jacoby previously had acknowledged talks with Saatchi after they had broken down (AA, Dec. 16), this marks his first acknowledgment of active conversations. However, since he would only issue a confirmation through a spokesperson, it remains unclear whether he has changed his position on the Saatchi offer or whether he is merely meeting his legal responsibilities to the board by entertaining new proposals.

A Saatchi/Bates deal, which would follow this year's acquisition by Saatchi of Backer & Spielvogel and the phased acquisition of Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, would be an extraordinarily complicated deal, not only because of the number of client conflicts but their intensity as well.

There appears to be little doubt that the BBDO/DDB/Needham deal—referred to as "the Big Bang" at BBDO—has set the stage for similarly unprecedented megadeals.

"I think there will be one or two others. It's sort of an infection that gets into the air," said Edward Meyer, chairman of Grey Advertising, who said he was not interested in any such activity.

But if agency megadealing spreads, as it seems to be, it won't be because it's the chic thing to do but because accelerating changes in the advertising business within the last year have permanently and dramatically altered the thinking of agency managers.

Those changes and issues, which the chief executives of BBDO, DDB and Needham acknowledged explicitly as factors in their decision, include the following:

- The Saatchi brothers' acquisition strategy has rewritten the rules of the game and

Fox fourth Network plans pick up steam

By WAYNE WALLEY

Los Angeles—Only a few days ago, the ambitious plans of Rupert Murdoch and 20th Century Fox chairman-ceo Barry Diller to create a fourth tv network were being dismissed by almost every expert as fantastic folly.

But following the revelation last week that the Fox Broadcasting Co. will begin a phased rollout of a fourth-network in March of 1987 the heads of Hollywood studios, major tv station groups and big-budget advertisers immediately started lining up behind the network.

Peter Spengler, advertising director for Bristol-Myers, said, "I've set aside a substantial budget for the Fox network." Bristol-Myers in 1985 spent $127.6 million

The elements of Martin's style 40
Last year, Joel P. Martin acquired a new hair style. Out went the previous user-friendly, conservative coif; in came an angular wedge. It was decidedly more Grace Jones than Lena Horne. Accompanying the change in hair was a subtle alteration in wardrobe. Out went the tailored business suit; in came a more haute couture look. This makeover not only expressed a more individual fashion sense; it served as a signal to the white, male-dominated world of Madison Avenue that the black, female founder of New York agency J.P. Martin Associates was established and here to stay.

Warner-Lambert Co.'s American Chicle division has not let up on its desire to compete more effectively with Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co. in the sugared, stick chewing-gum market. Also, Wrigley will see new competition from Minnetonka, which is introducing nationally its new Check-Up gum.

Guinness takes stout stance 60
Brewery giant Guinness Plc, the white-knight victor in an acrimonious takeover battle for Distillers Co. For Guinness, the $3.95 billion purchase represents the creation of a British-based international company strong enough to take on the international giants of the drinks business such as Seagram and Suntory.

McCann losing Swatch? 61
McCann-Erickson may be losing its three-year hold over the Swatch watch account in some European countries, just as it lost the business in the U.S. when Swatch moved its advertising in-house, industry sources say. McCann executives firmly deny the reports, saying the agency has negotiated a budget with Swatch and made initial marketing plans for 1987.

Saatchi exec says 'Yes' to Michigan

By RAYMOND SERAFIN

Southfield, Mich.—David Welch has been appointed president of Saatchi & Saatchi Compton's office here, a clear signal that Saatchi & Saatchi Worldwide is convinced client American Motors Corp. not only will survive, but thrive.

Mr. Welch has been deputy chairman of the London-based parent company. Saatchi has been looking for a top officer in Detroit since the former field service shop was expanded to full service last fall for client Jeep division. It was a gamble that paid off handsomely when AMC consolidated all its advertising for Renault-AMC and Jeep with Saatchi, dropping Grey Advertising.

Premiums & Promotions

Employe incentives rising to top of industry

By Joanne Y. Cleaver

Promotion specialists are fond of saying, "There's nothing new under the sun, just different ways of doing the same old thing."

This year may prove them both right and wrong. The growth of the premium and incentive business—a major component of the $60 billion sales promotion industry—is slowing, industry experts say, but the sales incentive category, especially travel incentives and employe incentives, is growing steadily.

Travel incentives, a time-tested technique used to encourage dealers and sales staff, is the fastest growing category, according to New York-based Incentive Marketing magazine.

Joanne Y. Cleaver is a frequent contributor to Special Report.

Total travel expenditures for sales and dealer incentives in 1985 increased slightly more than 10% over 1984, to $1.6 billion.

Giving away free trips to hot salespeople is a technique in tune with traditional trade promotion philosophy—encourage sales by rewarding volume.

An emerging strategy is employe—not sales—incentives. These programs, which reward for success in several areas, are designed to reinforce, encourage and motivate all personnel, from manufacturing line workers to secretaries.

Employe incentives are now the hot topic in the promotion industry. Some expect the category to become as entrenched in American corporations as sales force incentives have been.

According to Incentive Marketing research based on reader polls, the entire premium and incentive industry grew 7.9% last year, to $12.8 billion. Travel was the only category to post double-digit growth. All areas—business to business, consumer, travel, merchandise and package goods promotions—grew more slowly last year than they did in 1984.

Source: Incentive Marketing

In that year, virtually every segment of the industry grew at least 11%, with several areas logging growth rates of 15% or more, according to the trade journal.

Another major trade publication in the field, New York-based Premium/Incentive Business, estimates promotional spending at more than $20 billion in 1985, up 6% from 1984. The magazine, using a reading survey, estimates spending on consumer promotions reached $6.5 billion in 1984.

Industry insiders say the slower growth is the result of marketers taking a more cautious and demanding attitude toward promotional activity. Likewise, consumers are more demanding and shopping among promotional offers.

> "More and more businesses are thinking in terms of incentives than ever before. Price reductions don't increase business for very long."
> Jay Thalheim
> Thalheim Expositions

Jay Thalheim, president of Thalheim Expositions, the Manhasset, N.Y., company that organizes the annual Premium Incentive Show, says travel incentives are an important part of industry growth.

Total exhibitors at the Premium Incentive Show in New York, May 5-8, number 1,500, up from 1,204 in 1985, he says. Last year, travel-related exhibitors were included in those figures, but this year, the first Meetings and Incentive Travel Expo is being held jointly with the premium show and lists 300 exhibitors.

"More and more businesses are thinking in terms of incentives than ever before. Price reductions don't increase business for very long," Mr. Thalheim says. "Premiums have a much more lasting impact, and touch the entire family."

Mr. Thalheim also says incentives for all uses, business and consumer, are becoming more sophisticated.

"Computers, leisure clothing and sports apparel are strong segments," he says. "Furs, jewels, high-price watches that weren't previously offered are now used as a grand prize."

Other experts agree that various social and economic pressures are changing both the types of promotions and the way consumers are responding to them.

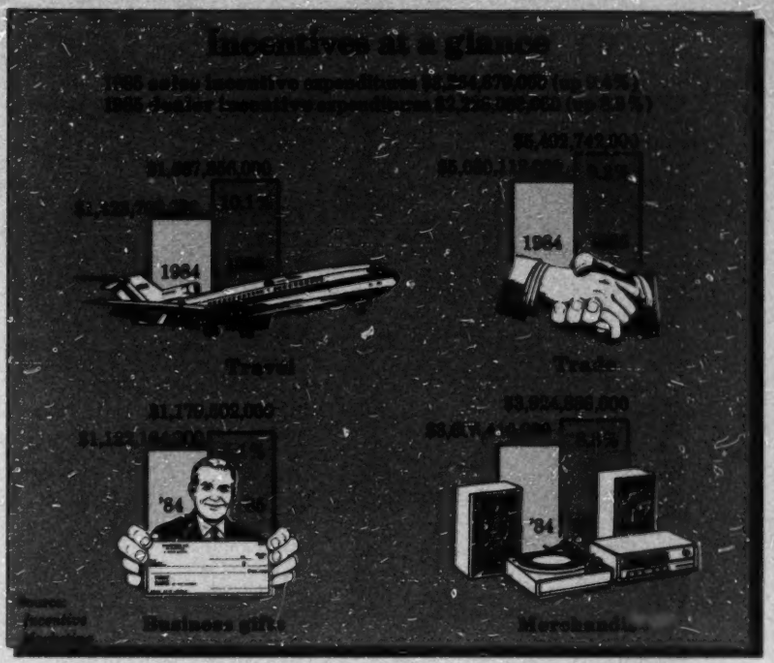
Widespread retail discounting has somewhat undermined the importance of self-liquidation and commonly available promotions. Consumers can shop around locally and often find a price as good as and sometimes better than that offered in a promotion.

Some items, like telephones, have been so aggressively marketed through all outlets and media that they are losing appeal as an attention-grabbing premium.

Consequently, marketers are more carefully considering the incentive item than they have in the past. Robert Brandon, president of Beaumont-Bennett/-Brandon, an Atlanta-based promotion agency and a subsidiary of Grey Advertising, detects a trend toward premiums that turn the consumer's attention back to the original product or service.

Items that are accessories to the primary product, such as a free printer with the purchase of a personal computer, reinforce the corporate or brand image in the consumer's mind, he says.

"I call them logical premiums," he says.



"It's an extension of the product itself. It's not something people will pick up because it's faddish. You don't just put your name on a Frisbee."

Marketers also are trying to develop continuity programs that become regularly featured in the product's over-all marketing strategy.

A few continuity programs have become so successful their marketers won't discuss them for fear of jeopardizing future promotions. McDonald's Corp., for example, will not discuss its Happy Meal promotion designed by Frankel & Co. in Chicago. The promotion started about eight years ago as a gimmick to lure children and their parents by featuring a small toy, book or token with a hamburger, drink and order of french fries in a specially designed box.

The Happy Meal since has developed into a regular product, and promotion industry observers cite it as an example of how a promotion can develop a long and successful life of its own.

Such continuity programs have a special appeal. Marketers have the opportunity to build on the promotion, says Allyn M. Miller, president of Flair Communications Agency in Chicago.

"Instead of idea shopping, marketers are interested in long-term, formalized planning. If you're just buying random ideas, you're missing consistency. And the likelihood of a marketer hitting on something that will drive business on a long-term basis is unlikely," he says. "You can't repeat everything. But if you have something that works, enhance it for the next year."

Flair has worked on several promotions that evolved into continuity programs. Stroh Brewery Co.'s campaign for Stroh's

Coupons and rebates attract consumers' attention

By Len Strazewski

Print ads that include or describe a sales promotion are more effective in generating brand awareness than nonpromotional advertising, says a study sponsored by Chicago-based Frankel & Co.

The study, conducted in 1984 and 1985 for Frankel, a marketing services agency, by Perception Research Services, Englewood Cliffs, N.J., tracked subjects' eye movements as they flipped through two magazines containing both general brand advertising and advertising featuring a promotion or special offer.

In the two magazine test cases, 84% and 85% of consumers tested became "involved" (spent more than a fleeting glance) with promotional advertising, and 81% and 83% saw the brand name advertised, compared with 84% and 79% becoming involved with nonpromotional advertising and 76% and 71% noticing the brand name, according to the study.

Promotional advertising also improves consumer attitudes about products more frequently and to a greater extent than general brand advertising, the study says.

While no more than 14% of subjects said the advertising changed their attitude about the advertised products, promotional advertising generated two to three times the change of ordinary advertising.

Of the tested promotional ads, coupons were the most likely to draw consumers' attention to the brand name—particularly when combined with rebates. However, sweepstakes, even when coupled with rebates, were the least likely to draw attention to the brand name.

A company that cares about its customers 12%
Good value for the money 12%
High quality 12%
A brand I would definitely consider buying 12%
Source: Frankel & Co.

About 84% of those tested became involved and recognized a brand name in ads involving a coupon and rebate offer, compared with only 80% involvement and recognition with coupon advertising alone.

A combination of coupon, rebate and sweepstakes generated only 79% involvement and recognition, and a coupon and sweepstakes generated only 72% recognition. Premium offers alone generated 79% involvement and recognition; rebates alone produced 78% involvement and recognition, and a free offer produced only 77% involvement and brand recognition.

Sweepstakes alone generated only 58% involvement and brand recognition, and even coupled with a rebate, sweepstakes were poor performers, producing 62% involvement and recognition.

Not all coupon advertising is equally effective. In general, the larger the cash offer of the coupon, the better recognition generated. In the two magazine test cases, 58% and 48% of respondents reported seeing a coupon offering 25 cents off, compared with 43% and 40% saying they saw a coupon offering less than 25 cents off.

The study noted some results that conflict with conventional wisdom about coupon advertising. Multiple coupons in a single medium are seen more often, but generate less involvement and less brand recognition, and coupons placed at the top of a magazine page are more likely to be seen by a consumer, but just as likely to generate involvement and brand recognition.

Coupon value

As the value of a coupon increases, the likelihood that it will be noticed also increases. In both magazine treatments, coupon values of 25¢ or more were much more likely to be seen than coupon values of less than 25¢.

tional dinner dance, but after dinner, when Mr. Webster was called up on the stage to speak and receive an Academy Award Oscar facsimile, he turned to the audience and said, "You're the people who deserve the Oscar."

Look-alikes for four stars, Dolly Parton, Clint Eastwood, Linda Evans and Burt Reynolds, brought each of the guests to the stage, where they were presented with Oscars and a kiss.

Old standby themes haven't disappeared. Just because a theme has been used frequently doesn't diminish the effect.

Patty Habeeb, president of Conventions a la Carte, New Orleans, says, "When people come here, they expect jazz, Mardi Gras, food fests and river boats. New Orleans lends itself superbly to such themes." Selecting a theme can be an art. Jim McNabb of New York-based McNabb & Associates is not the biggest fan of such parties. "I think they're often hackneyed and overused. Read any hotel brochure, and you'll come upon some silly little theme party where they give out paper hats and cheap eye patches."

For Mr. NcNabb, the key is selecting the correct theme. "What you choose depends upon the travel experience, the home life, the standard of living of the guests. You have to find out if they're young, outgoing sales people or older, upper-management and owner types."

No matter how wild or how traditional, the theme party strategy remains the same. Says Mr. Guerriero, "If I can get people off their fannies, the entire program is that much better."

by John Sebastian, former lead singer of the Lovin' Spoonful.

The shows featured music videos of '60s and early '70s hits. The program was syndicated by All-America Television, New York, and about 140 stations aired the first show in December and a second in February.

Chrysler Corp. is inviting 2,000 VIPs this summer to enjoy the bands of Harry James, Jimmy Dorsey and others.

"Ratings came in a little lower than we anticipated," says Joel Gallen, an independent producer who worked with producers Scotti Bros./Syd Vinnedge, Los Angeles.

"We don't have all the numbers yet, but we think for the two shows they will be between 6 and 10 share, still nice numbers for a syndicated special. We were incredibly satisfied with the good press coverage and reviews," he says.

Mr. Gallen estimates the cost of each show at $1 million and says Lincoln-Mercury covered 65% to 70% of the budgets. Shows were sold on an advertiser-supported basis, with the auto maker getting five out of the 12 minutes of commercial time. Local dealers bought some of the remaining spots.

The producers expect to sell the special to foreign markets this summer and to release a 50-minute home video in June.

Auto makers also are sponsoring concert tours packaged with radio spots featuring local dealers and sweepstakes, which in some cities offer dealer-provided cars as prizes.

Rick Springfield's "Drivin' Rock and Roll" tour of 25 cities for Ford began in August, 1984, and was the first of a series of concerts sponsored by auto makers.

Later, General Motors' Pontiac motor division in Pontiac, Mich., followed with the Hall & Oates "Big Bam Boom" tour for promoting the Fiero. More than 500,000 people attended 78 concerts in 75 cities from October, 1984, through May, 1985.

Pontiac ad manager Charlene Curry says Pontiac was pleased with the turnout and reports improved consumer awareness.

Local sweepstakes tie-ins were also successful. Pat McCarthy, senior vp of communications at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., says 9,500 people registered at dealerships for a car giveaway in Memphis, Tenn.

Another successful concert tour featured Mr. Rogers beginning in August, 1984, with more than 100 appearances for Dodge trucks. In Chicago, 40,000 concertgoers received a key that fit a Dodge pickup at a local dealership. Of those, 9,000 visited dealerships, and a truck was given away.

"The demographics of Kenny's audiences fits truck buyers," says Lisa Davis, Dodge sales promotion planner. "The parking lots at the concerts were full of pickup trucks. Dealer traffic increased and, yes, it was worth all the money it cost."

Other truck competitors are taking the same approach. Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Torrance, Cal., has announced plans to sponsor concerts and other events at Opryland in Nashville, Tenn., and Knotts' Berry Farm in Los Angeles.

William Daniels of "St. Elsewhere" gave a professional touch to a video on Lincoln-Mercury sponsored "Deja View."

American Motors Corp., Southfield, Mich., is using the Beach Boys to promote its Jeep Commanche pickup truck. The rock group opened to sellout audiences of 60,000 at Jack Murphy Stadium in San Diego in May, 1985. American Motors estimates the 40-city tour reached 3 million people before its conclusion late last year.

The "Jeep 'n Safari" tour was tied in with major radio stations and retailers in each town. "The tour was very cost-effective for the number of exposures," says Mark Liska, vp-account supervisor at Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, American Motors' agency.

The tie-in continues with a nationwide "Buckle Up for Safety" campaign featuring Jeep-produced radio and tv public service spots with the Beach Boys.

In February, General Motors' Chevrolet division in Warren, Mich., jumped into musical promotion with "Chevy Super Tour '86," featuring the country music group Alabama and the rhythm and blues favorites the Pointer Sisters. Industry sources estimate the total cost for the program at about $15 million, including about $100,000 per city in production costs.

Alabama launched its 30-city tour Feb. 23 in Atlanta and is drawing full houses, the company says. The Pointer Sisters start a 20-city tour in June.

Feedback is positive, says Sterling Wesley, assistant manager-passenger car merchandising for Chevrolet. "We feel we are getting benefits in terms of the young consumers in that audience."Another Chevrolet bid to 18 to 35-year-olds is its sponsorship of 150 video dance parties on college campuses.

The program, provided free to on-campus organizations for charitable or club activities, features three hours of videos by such artists as Billy Joel and Huey Lewis and the News.

Admission charges are split between student charities and Chevrolet-sponsored leukemia research.

Auto makers are not ignoring older consumers and their music, either. Chrysler Corp. is inviting 2,000 VIPs in 10 cities this summer to enjoy the bands of Harry James, Jimmy Dorsey, Tommy Dorsey and others and to see prototypes of upcoming Chrysler models such as the Dodge Shadow and Plymouth Sundance.

Only one automobile company contacted by Advertising Age is resisting the musical trends. American Honda Motor Co., Gardena, Cal., says music is just a distraction from the product message.

"We have a competitor using a fairly predominant figure, and it's a fairly good ad for the celebrity," says Eric Conn, manager of automobile advertising. "But it doesn't say anything about the product. We want to make the car the star."

Employe incentives rising

capitalizes on seasonal themes and word plays to draw consumers' attention to retail displays.

The "Stroh a Party" promotion has been used every summer since 1970, Mr. Miller says, but every year, the company slightly changes the theme's execution. Sometimes Stroh includes other marketers of party foods such as potato chips as a tie-in.

Retailers group other items like charcoal and other party goods, around the Stroh display, creating more attention. Over the years, tv, radio and print advertising support has been added to the promotion.

Because of the success of "Stroh a Party," the company developed a winter theme about 10 years ago, Mr. Miller says. The "Strohman" promotion is built around a cartoon-like snowman character.

Marketers are flocking to travel as logical companions for continuity programs. While continuity programs build consumer awareness and brand loyalty, splashy travel awards are the prizes that grab people's attention and get them excited.

"Some people want day-to-day things [prizes]," says Deborah Hause, editor of Premium/Incentive Business in New York.

"But some people already have the necessary things, and they want to win something totally outrageous. The whole idea is to give somebody something they'd adore, that they wouldn't go out and buy themselves," she says.

Promotion industry insiders agree travel is the ultimate "guilt-free incentive," as one consultant put it.

Travel is a treat to be enjoyed by the person who earned or won it, and travel is the kind of planned purchase that most families defer in the face of financial demands for school, clothing and local recreation.

In 1984, total business-to-business expenditures for travel incentives leaped 17.5% and in 1985 it grew 10.1%, significantly ahead of the over-all industry rate. Says Murray Elman, publisher of Incentive Marketing, "Some companies are getting into travel that were previously into only merchandise."

But travel incentives are not cheap. Incentive Marketing estimates 42% of all incentive trips cost between $500 and $1,199 per person, and the remainder are more expensive.

Mr. Elman says marketers tend to take a first-class attitude toward travel incentives and are willing to spend money on frills and perks.

With such juicy plums as trips being dangled before dealer and sales personnel, it's no wonder some rank-and-file employes were feeling neglected.

Because generous sales incentive programs sometimes backfire into poor employe relations, corporations are beginning to take notice of the rest of their employes, says Anne Wold, a partner at Gallagher/Wold, an incentive travel agency in New York.

"There was resentment among the other employes that just because they [salesmen] sold something, they got a trip," she says, recalling how one client company came to launch an employe incentive program 11 years ago.

A computer service company that often sent employes to work at customer sites realized all its employes, not just sales staff, shaped its reputation with clients, she says. So the company established criteria for outstanding job performances for virtually all positions, including the mail clerks.

In any given year, only about 3% of the company's nonsales employes win a six-day trip to a domestic resort, but the award is enough to capture the attention of the work force.

"It's a once in a lifetime trip for most of these people," Ms. Wold says. "We really haven't found a negative aspect to it. It puts the emphasis where it should be, on performance."

Her client found that absenteeism decreased, productivity increased and the employe incentive program became an effective recruiting tool.

Employe incentive programs have captured more than the attention of promotion experts who believe it will be the next biggest growth area for the premiums and incentive business. Incentive Marketing was so taken with the idea it's setting up its own internal incentive program, Mr. Elman says.

"We're just establishing goals, of quality of work, productivity and adhering to budgets," he says. When the program is established, Incentive Marketing employes may finally be able to participate in some of the prizes, trips and awards they write about.

DYR to open China office

By VALERIE MACKIE

DYR Worldwide is expected to announce by June that it will open an office in China—possibly in partnership with the Chinese government.

Details of the opening still are being negotiated and sources say a cooperative agreement with a government subsidiary is likely.

Alex Brody, president and ceo of DYR, was in China last month working out an agreement.

"We have had a lot of requests from major clients here [Hong Kong] to spend sizable amounts of money in China—so we see a lot of potential there," said Bo Seifert, managing director of DYR Hong Kong, in a Hong Kong trade publication.

Some of DYR's clients in Hong Kong include Colgate-Palmolive Co., Johnson & Johnson and Beatrice Foods.

The move by DYR, a 50/50 joint venture between New York-based Young & Rubicam and Tokyo-based Dentsu, is part of Y&R's plan to take its "whole egg" communications philosophy to China.

DYR's agency in China—a marketplace increasingly attracting both U.S. and Japanese marketers—may also offer services not available from other shops, but DYR officials declined to elaborate.

Burson-Marsteller International, Y&R's public relations company, started operating in China last year after signing a cooperative agreement with China Media Development, a Chinese government news agency (AA, Sept. 16).

DYR is also looking to establish a presence in the U.K., France and Italy and in March the agency acquired a minority share in a German shop (AA, March 17).

McCann-Erickson, the only other U.S. agency with an office in China, opened its doors for business in Beijing in 1979.

McCann owns a majority stake in the agency, called Interpublic Jardine, which is a joint venture with Hong Kong-based Jardine trading company.

The office serves mostly system clients, such as Coca-Cola Co. and Kodak Co., and has expanded to more than 10 executives, including general manager, account and client directors and liaison officers. In 1985, agency billings reached about $2.5 million.

A few other U.S.-based agencies, such as Ogilvy & Mather and J. Walter Thompson Co., operate what they call "China teams." These consist of staffers who are based in Hong Kong and travel frequently to China.

Top alcoholic drink advertisers in Europe

In 1985, Johnnie Walker Scotch whisky took the lead over Jagermeister as the leading alcoholic beverage advertiser in Europe, spending $4.2 million compared to $4 million for Jagermeister. Note that figures pertain only to print ads in European publications and that all figures are expressed in millions of dollars spent on ads between January and November of 1984 and 1985. Ad plans uncertain

Guinness expected to lift sagging Distillers

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—Brewery giant Guinness Plc, the white-knight victor in an acrimonious takeover battle for Distillers Co. Ltd., is expected to inject more marketing savvy into Distillers' declining brand shares around the world. For Guinness, the $3.95 billion purchase represents "the creation of a British-based international company strong enough to take on the international giants of the drinks business such as Seagrams and Suntory," said a Guinness executive.

"Distillers just seemed to have slipped away," said Julie Feaver, an analyst at London stockbroker Sheppard & Chase. "They have extremely well known brand names like Johnnie Walker, but their image could be polished."

Distillers' best-selling Scotch whisky, Johnny Walker Red Label, lost 2.2% in world market share between 1980 and 1984, when sales of the brand totaled 6.4 million cases annually. If Distillers is revamped to promote its premium brands, "that's where Guinness' techniques could be useful," Ms. Feaver said.

Guinness itself has been revamped since Ernest Saunders became chief executive five years ago and began divesting the company of all but its core businesses.

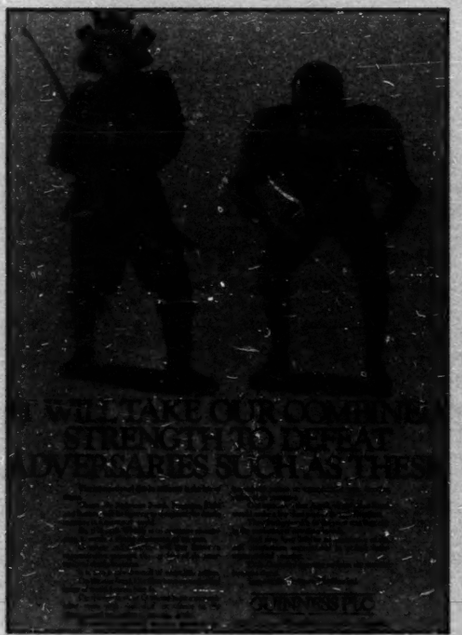
"Saunders radically altered the structure of Guinness," Ms. Feaver said. "He sold off about 100 companies and has now got Guinness into four divisions: Brewing, retailing, publishing and health. It has been good for Guinness' image—before, it was slightly muddled."

Guinness also moved further into the international beverage market last year with the purchase of Perth, Scotland-based whisky producer Arthur Bell & Sons, after a disputed takeover bid.

Guinness executives declined to comment on whether advertising will be reviewed for Distillers brands, which use eight agencies in the U.K. However, sources said D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles is expected to continue handling international advertising for Distillers' Dewar's Scotch whisky, the U.S. market leader. Guinness uses Ogilvy & Mather, also a Distillers agency, for most of its advertising worldwide.

Guinness is in the process of selling off 10 whisky brands to fulfill an agreement with the U.K.'s Office of Fair Trading to reduce the joint Guinness-Distillers share of the U.K. spirits market from 35% to 25%.

Guinness' initial bid for Distillers was referred to the Monopolies Commission by the OFT to investigate possible antitrust violations. Guinness headed off the investigation by making a second bid that guaranteed a 10% reduction in combined market share.



A Guinness ad calls for support of its takeover bid.

Guinness is selling the worldwide trademark rights to five whisky brands and the U.K. trademark rights to five other brands to Scottish whisky company Whyte & MacKay for $15 million.

Guinness defeated U.K. supermarket group Argyll Stores Ltd., which launched the initial hostile bid for Distillers that led to Guinness' entry into the bitter takeover battle as a white knight.

Even so, Guinness filed lawsuits against Argyll in U.S. and U.K. courts stemming from allegedly unfair advertising during the dispute. The suits are pending.

Both sides poured millions of dollars into aggressive full-page newspaper ads designed to win the confidence of stockholders.

One Argyll ad showed graphs with downward curves purporting to represent Distillers and Guinness results and the copy line "You can see why Distillers feels at home with Guinness."

An ad by Guinness and Distillers, which reportedly spent a combined $7 million on their takeover advertising, read "Own up, Argyll. You have a serious drink problem."

Bell's U.S. subsidiary, Wellington Importers, filed suit against Argyll and its ad agency, Saatchi & Saatchi, in the U.S. in March, alleging misuse of Bell's Scotch whisky trademark in newspaper ads supporting Argyll's bid for Distillers. The suit sought damages of more than $200 million.

Sources say the deal with Distillers, which exports 88% of its products, will give Guinness a more international profile.

Of Guinness' total 1985 sales of $1.77 billion, the U.K. and Ireland accounted for 70% of sales, as well as 67% of pretax profits of $129 million.

The U.S. market represents 7% of sales and 5% of pretax profits.

Danes will drop ad ban

By JACK BURTON

Denmark, one of the last European holdouts against commercial tv, is planning to drop its ban against tv advertising.

The first commercials ever on Danish tv could appear on some local stations as early as this fall. However, all tv advertising will be subject to heavy restrictions.

The decision to allow tv advertising is tied to the planned startup of a second national tv channel, TV 2, in 1988.

Advertising initially will finance an estimated one-third of TV 2's $60 million budget, with the rest made up by state subsidies and license fees.

Advertising is eventually expected to cover at least 60% of the budget, but sources said the amount of ad time may have to be increased to reach that goal.

Spots will run on a handful of regional stations, which will form the TV 2 network. One of those, TV Syd (TV South), a local station in south Jutland, could possibly start broadcasting commercials this fall.

An independent state-run company will sell ad time on TV 2 with advertisers having to buy time one year in advance. Advertisers cannot choose what time their commercials will be shown beyond picking the month of broadcast.

Commercials will be limited to three five-minute blocks a day, with 10 minutes shown during national programing and five minutes during regional programs inserted in TV 2's broadcast schedule.

Advertising for tobacco and alcohol, including beer, will be prohibited, a blow to Danish breweries, one of the country's major industries and biggest advertisers. Also banned are ads for medicine, banks, political parties and religious organizations as well as commercials aimed specifically at youths.

The restrictions reflect the political difficulty in reaching an agreement on the tv advertising issue, which has taken three years of hard negotiations among Denmark's half-dozen major political parties.

Agreement was reached only after the opposition Social Democratic party, which firmly opposed tv advertising, dropped out of negotiations, paving the way for a deal between other parties. The bill to permit tv advertising is expected to be narrowly approved by the Danish parliament this month.

TV 2 will be run by a state-appointed board of directors but will be independent of Danmarks Radio, the country's existing broadcast monopoly. Headquarters for TV 2 will be located in a major regional city to avoid having all media power concentrated in Copenhagen.

Half of TV 2's programing will come from Denmark or other Scandinavian countries, which should provide an enormous boost to independent program producers in the Nordic region, since TV 2 does not plan to produce any programing.

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page.... Width and Depth in Inches.
2. Determine Square Inches of Page.... Multiply Width by Depth Inches.
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page.... Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches).
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page.... Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page.

S&S' $450M buys Bates

Colgate likely to leave $7.6 billion mega-shop

By STEWART ALTER

Saatchi & Saatchi Co. is expected to announce today that it will acquire Ted Bates Worldwide for $450 million, a move that would immediately realize the London-based company's ambition to be the No. 1 ad-agency group in the world.

Excluding possible client fallout, Saatchi's worldwide advertising empire will now include $7.6 billion in billings in 150 worldwide offices. Bates is likely to resign its Colgate-Palmolive business since Procter & Gamble is more important to the Saatchi organization.

The Bates purchase is likely to satisfy Saatchi's appetite for acquiring ad agencies for the time being.

The deal—by far the biggest in advertising history—rewrites the rankings of the top ad agency holding companies only two weeks after BBDO International-Doyle Dane Bernbach Group-Needham Harper Worldwide shook it up with their formation of a $5 billion operation (AA, April 28).

The staggering terms of the Bates payout—reported to be $400 million in cash upfront and another $50 million in two years—is said to solve the problem around which the talks broke down five months ago (AA, Dec. 16).

At that time, Bates chairman Bob Jacoby reportedly walked away from the deal at about the same price level because he objected to Saatchi's typical payout structure on acquisitions, which involves cash upfront and future payments contingent on profit performance.

Sources indicate Mr. Jacoby will make $85 million to $100 million on the deal. But Mr. Jacoby, who retains his Bates title, as do other key executives, reportedly does not intend to leave and will be one of a group of executives tied into long-term contracts. Reports on this group's number vary from seven to 15.

The purchase price will be about 21 times net earnings. Bates' pretax profits are said to be about $30 million for the year ended last March 31, with net earnings about half of that.

There are about 200 Bates shareholders who will share in the proceeds. The book value for each of Bates' 400,000 shares is said to be $820 in cash.

According to various sources, who added that the purchase price will not earn a profit for Saatchi's first two years, Mr. Jacoby will receive another $50 million in the next two years. Mr. Jacoby [illegible]

Icahn may cut O&M, eyes Y&R or DFS

By BRIAN MORAN

NEW YORK—Trans World Airlines chairman Carl Icahn may fire Ogilvy & Mather for the second time in little more than six months. Late last week the corporate raider was trying to decide whether to award the business to Young & Rubicam or DFS Dorland Worldwide.

Y&R was said to be the stronger contender for the account, by virtue of the agency's association with present TWA executives via its 1970s work for Eastern Air Lines. But a cadre of Mr. Icahn's personal advisers, including his wife, son, uncle and a friend, Sheldon Kravitz, a former executive at Lennen & Newell—all of whom were present during agency presentations May 8—were believed to be delaying the financier's decision.

Mr. Icahn, who unceremoniously fired O&M Oct. 23 in an attempt (which succeeded) to force the agency to work for reduced compensation, reportedly became dissatisfied with the agency's refusal to create advertising tailored to his demands. TWA insiders report that Mr. Icahn, eager to fill loss-ridden TWA's seats, favored price-oriented, retail advertising with a modicum of creativity. O&M, highly respected for its creative talents, reportedly made many concessions but could not swallow Mr. Icahn's terms whole.

"Ogilvy's philosophy was probably right for us—they wanted to maintain some level of creativity," said a TWA source. "But they dug their own grave by continuing to

Nets upfront outlook grim 3
The tv networks began screening their new fall schedules for advertisers last week, and early reports from buyers and sellers reveal that the tv nets and advertisers are far apart on the price of prime time tv in 1986-87.

The risk of insurance 3
Product-liability insurance, once considered a routine operating expense, is playing a bigger role in marketing decisions. Soaring insurance rates, increasing litigation and multi-million-dollar court awards are contributing in some cases to growing tension between company sales/marketing arms and their risk managers.

RJR Nabisco will spend on a $30.7 million basis (nationally projected) in the West Coast test of Nabisco Fruit Wheats ready-to-eat-cereal. RJR unveiled its plans at the Food Marketing Institute's annual meeting and convention here last week.

Eenie, meenie, Riney gets mo' 32
Anheuser-Busch last week officially welcomed aboard Hal Riney & Partners, but left unclear which ship he will be steering. Riney, which earlier resigned its G. Both the agency and spokesmen for A-B declined to specify which products the Riney agency will handle.

Washington—In a move that could bring a major change to the way that beer and wine are advertised, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms is relaxing its restrictions on the use of active athletes in ads endorsing alcoholic beverages.

Brewers and wineries have not been formally notified of the agency's reassessment of its advertising guidelines, but Bruce Weininger, chief of the agency's industry compliance division, told Advertising Age that BATF now considers permissible beer and wine advertising that features athletes—active or retired—as long as the athlete is not shown consuming the alcoholic beverage and does not

Cosby's image pays dividends

New York—Bill Cosby last week began telling millions of tv viewers how E.F. Hutton & Co. is helping him become a shrewd investor.

Considering how Mr. Cosby engineered his spokesman deal with the troubled brokerage house, it's evident he hasn't fared too poorly on his own all these years.

When Hutton executives first approached the popular comedian in early spring, they proposed a partnership that would allow the brokerage to sponsor some Cosby live appearances around the country.

Hutton in 1983 had made a similar tour sponsorship deal

AGENCY WATCH

JWT and Ogilvy still top ad directors' rankings

FMR called 'hottest' shop

By CHARLOTTE FLANAGAN

Company advertising directors continue to rank J. Walter Thompson Co. and Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide as the nation's two best ad agencies, while Fallon McElligott Rice has emerged as the hottest agency, according to ADVERTISING AGE's latest quarterly survey.

In the January-to-March polling period, 6.6% of respondents named JWT as the best agency. Ogilvy was next with 6%. The difference between the two is not statistically significant.

Only one mention separates the two agencies in the cumulative Agency Watch results, which cover the five quarters since the survey began in October, 1984. (There was no survey in the fourth quarter last year.)

Ogilvy has received 110 mentions to date, equal to 7.4% of the 1,496 ad directors surveyed, and JWT has been named by 109 respondents, or 7.3% of the total.

Agency Watch is conducted for AD AGE by SRI Research Center Inc., Lincoln, Neb. In each survey period, SRI questions by telephone a random sample of 300 ad directors of companies with $25 million or more in sales.

The survey isn't limited to large advertisers in New York, Chicago and other principal agency cities, but questions ad directors in each of the 20 largest U.S. cities. Presumably, a poll of this sort, if confined to New York-based advertisers, or advertisers concentrated in any other major market, might produce different results.

In the best-agency questioning, respondents are asked, "Which ad agency, regardless of size, provides the best over-all services and products to its clients?"

They are allowed to name up to three agencies. Each mention is counted as one vote, whether or not it is the respondent's first choice.

In the latest Agency Watch survey, BBDO International was third, named by 4.3% of respondents, while Leo Burnett Co. and Foote, Cone & Belding Communications were named by 4% and 3%, respectively.

In cumulative results, Young & Rubicam, named by 4.2% of respondents, ranks third, followed by BBDO (3.9%) and Burnett (3.1%).

Other agencies named by 2% or more of the people surveyed to date are Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt (2.5%); Foote, Cone & Belding (2.2%); Doyle Dane Bernbach Group (2.1%); McCann-Erickson Worldwide (2.0%), and Chiat/-Day (2.0%).

JWT continues to dominate in top-of-mind agency awareness, though its score fell in the January-to-March survey. Asked to name the agency that first comes to mind, 21.6% of the respondents named JWT. The agency was named by at least 25% of mentions in each of the previous four quarters. Following JWT in awareness were Ogilvy & Mather (14.6%); BBDO (12.3%); Young & Rubicam (10.3%), and Doyle Dane Bern-

Pepsi, Jackson start 'relationship'

Not just a $15 million endorsement

By JUDANN DAGNOLI

PURCHASE, N.Y.—Pepsi-Cola Co. believes it has signed Michael Jackson for a song—at a reported $15 million—even though critics aren't convinced the contract is a thriller.

The pact (AA, May 5) buys "a relationship" rather than an endorsement, said Pepsi-Cola president-ceo Roger Enrico, in announcing the deal last week.

Mr. Enrico moved up to Pepsi-Cola president-ceo, a previously vacant post, from president-ceo of Pepsi-Cola USA, the franchised bottling unit in the U.S., in a management realignment last week following the expected retirement of PepsiCo chairman-ceo Donald Kendall.

Mr. Enrico also noted that the price tag, which he would only put at somewhere between $5.5 million and $15 million, was "the most money paid for any relationship of this kind."

Mr. Jackson will compose two pieces of original music for Pepsi and appear in three commercials, two in English and one in Spanish, Mr. Enrico said. The spots will air worldwide next year.

In 1988, the performer will act as creative consultant to Pepsi and perhaps direct a commercial.

Mr. Jackson's first Pepsi song will be included on his next album.

The contract does not require Mr. Jackson to hold, drink or come into contact with Pepsi, a company spokesman said.

Mr. Enrico explained that the U.S.' No. 2 cola marketer "never asked him to drink Pepsi," only to "create events."

Mr. Jackson has proven ability to boost Pepsi sales, the company said. It contended that sales rose 8% within 30 days as a direct result of the last Jackson campaign.

"Investments like this do indeed pay off," Mr. Enrico asserted. He said Mr. Jackson's presence will render Pepsi spots zap-proof.

The radio and tv spots will be longer than 30 seconds, he said, and will break in January, probably during the Grammy Awards show. The campaign does not include print advertising.

Pepsi signed a $5.5 million package with Mr. Jackson in 1984 that included commercials and sponsorship of his Victory Tour. The company would not say whether the new package includes any tour sponsorship, but other sources confirmed tour rights are included.

The new contract also provides for special events and Mr. Jackson's possible appearance in special advertising or in-person appearance during Pepsi-Cola's Goodwill Games sponsorship this July in Moscow, these sources said.

As to reports that Mr. Jackson was involved in sponsorship negotiations with Atlanta-based Coca-Cola Co., a Pepsi spokesman said that, to his knowledge, the stories were false. New York-based Rockbill, which negotiated the Pepsi package, said it never talked to Coca-Cola on Mr. Jackson's behalf.

Michael Jackson (r.) poses with Roger Enrico, president-ceo, Pepsi-Cola, and dozens of advertising awards for previous Pepsi/Jackson spots. It was, Mr. Enrico said, the first time Mr. Jackson had seen all the awards the campaign won.

Everything old again is new

Coca-Cola Co. has introduced a new version of its Coke logo, designed to give its products a more uniform look. The updated calligraphy was unveiled during the product's 100th anniversary celebration last week. The week's events, which carried a $1 million price tag, included a party for bottlers from each continent and a parade in Atlanta, the company's headquarters.

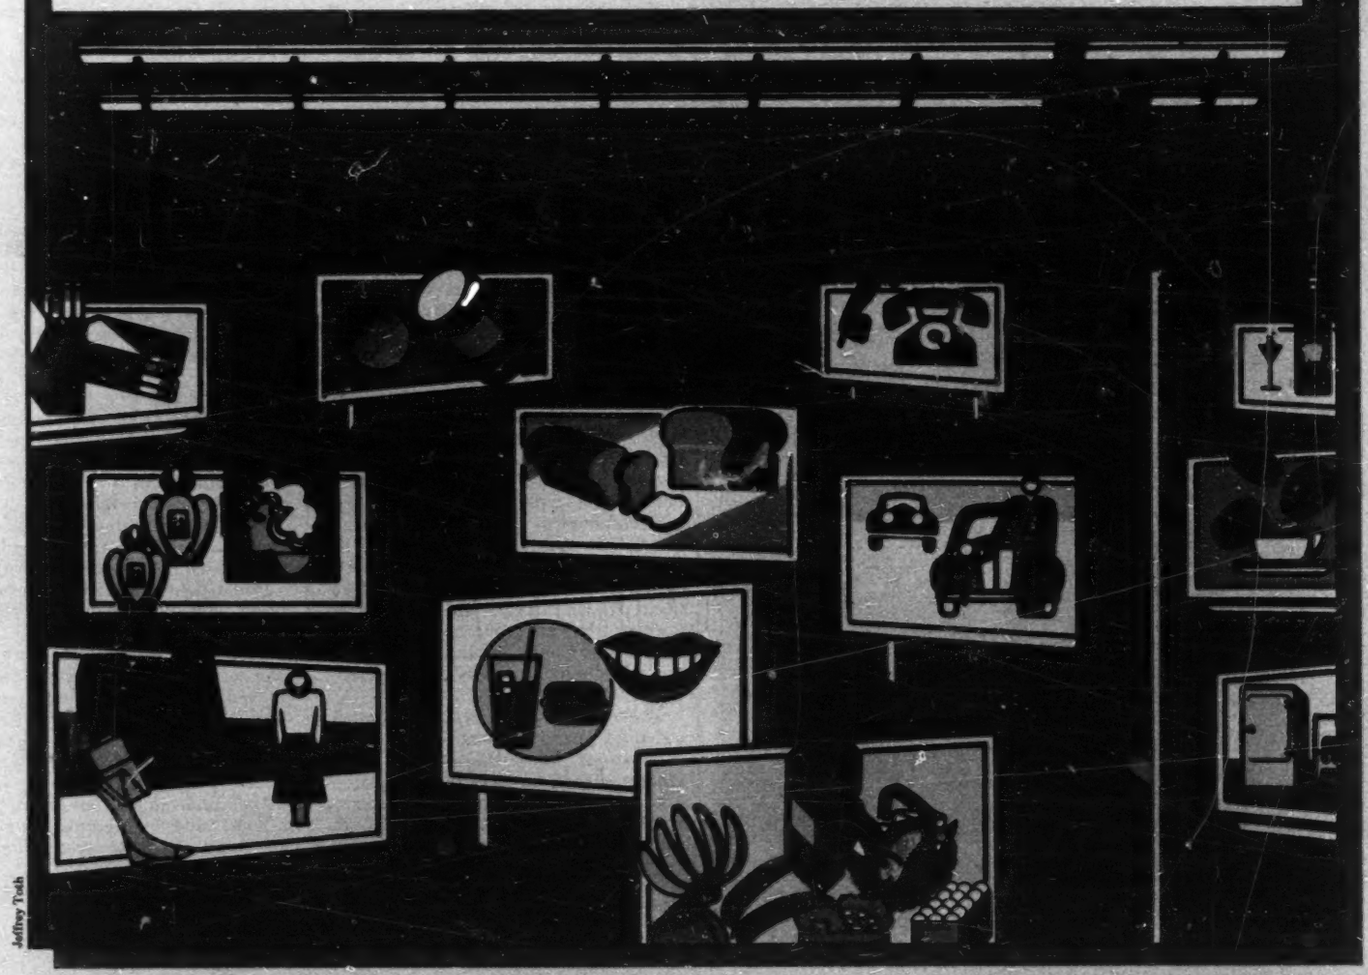
Out-of-Home Advertising



Jeffrey Toth

Segmentation attracts new product categories

By Richard Edel

For many years, the out-of-home medium was advertising's ugly duckling. Virtually ignored during corporate and agency media planning, it would waddle in at the tail end of budget assignments to pick at the crumbs.

But as advertisers seek new alternatives in an era of declining network tv audiences and demographic changes that include a dramatic increase in the number of working women, out-of-home is emerging as a viable medium.

Its ability to reach highly targeted markets and to supplement other media for total market coverage are among the factors pushing advertisers to the great outdoors.

Richard Edel is a frequent contributor to Special Report.

But the key trend is audience segmentation, says Eugene Morris, senior vp at Burrell Advertising, Chicago. "There is greater awareness today of segmentation in the advertising industry, period. As a result, advertisers are rethinking media decisions, looking for media that deliver the female segment, blacks, baby boomers or elderly consumers," he says.

Out-of-home scores well on segmentation, says Alice Vantrease, president of Creative Marketing Services, Augusta, Ga. By nature, it permits geographic targeting of specific groups. And it has the added advantage not only of reaching target audiences, but also frequently exposing them to the ad message. The icing is that out-of-home has the lowest cost per thousand impressions of any medium.

"Where radio and tv are frequency mediums, and newspapers and magazines are reach mediums, outdoor is both, and at the lowest cost," Ms. Vantrease says.

With these strengths, experts predict out-of-home media may soon be on the crest of a new wave in advertising. Sales revenue for the standard industry, which includes 30-sheet poster panels and painted bulletins, has grown 8% to 10% each year from $701 million in 1980 to $1.2 billion in 1985, according to the Institute of Outdoor Advertising, New York. Although out-of-home represents about 1% of spending for all media, its share has fallen slightly over three years.

Eight-sheet boards are on a faster growth track than 30-sheet, with estimated 75% growth since 1980 to 150,000 panels in 1985, says Ronald Waggener, executive director of the Eight-Sheet Outdoor Advertising Assn., Independence Mo.

But this medium represents only a small share of total out-of-home advertising. In 1985, eight-sheet board sales were $104 million, Mr. Waggener says.

Highway, transit, mall, and taxicab advertising accounted for about $400 million in 1985 sales, estimates Thomas C. Devine, marketing operations manager at 3M National Advertising Co., Bedford Park, Ill., a division of Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing, St. Paul, Minn. There is no independent means of verifying that figure.

Before any real growth, however, the industry has to begin effectively selling itself and educating prospective advertisers, industry sources say.

"Out-of-home right now is like a lost child in the wilderness," Ms. Vantrease says.

One factor expected to infuse out-of-home with new vigor is the industry's move to replace old-style outdoor boards constructed on unattractive scaffolding with bulletins that rise cleanly from a single pole. This is a critical factor in attracting new advertisers to the medium, outdoor executives say.

Technological innovation is another factor that could change the face of the industry. An announcement is expected within six months on a computerized, robotic painting device now being developed by a private group headed by John Kluge, chairman of Secaucus, N.J.-based Metromedia Inc. A similar device is being developed by 3M.

The robotic device would allow encoded designs to be wired to any number of locations, where the machine would create painted bulletin-size, magazine-quality reproductions in a matter of hours. With these capabilities, bulletins could be posted for shorter intervals, possibly a week as opposed to the standard 30 days, and their quality would not vary according to the skills of local painters.

Another factor changing the medium's face is the increasing level of marketing sophistication in larger companies such as Foster & Kleiser, Gannett Outdoor and Winston Network.

Additional change comes from mergers and acquisitions bringing new names into the business.

"We're seeing a metamorphosis of the industry from mom-and-pop outfits to an industry owned by national and international groups," says Gerard Joyce, president of Patrick Media Group, Scranton, Pa. "We're seeing a new breed of owners who have new insights into marketing to specific groups. We're just starting to feel the effects of that."

Mr. Joyce is an example of the new breed. In April, he signed a definitive agreement with Metromedia for the $710 million purchase of its Los Angeles-based Foster & Kleiser unit, the industry's largest outdoor company with 45,000 boards in 19 markets and annual revenues of $212 million in 1985.

Gannett Outdoor, the nation's second largest outdoor company with 15 markets, had 1985 revenues of $207 million.

Another example is Morris Communications, Augusta, Ga., a growing publisher of 18 newspapers in seven states, which bought Naegele Outdoor that covers about 400 cities and has an estimated $100 million in annual sales making it one of the top five outdoor companies.

Further impact on the use of out-of-home is expected from the June, 1985, merger of R.J. Reynolds Industries and Nabisco Brands and the September, 1985, acquisition of General Foods by Philip Morris Inc. These changes have the potential to dramatically increase the level of out-of-home advertising by package goods companies, Mr. Joyce says.

Media planners for the tobacco companies have long experience with out-of-home, he says.

"If we could just get some of the crumbs from package goods advertising, we could double our industry's revenues overnight," Mr. Joyce says. "We've had a very warm reception and we are maximizing the possibility of heretofore nonusers becoming heavy users."

In addition to package goods, the out-of-home industry recorded dramatic in-

Outdoor Network strives to post increasing sales

Falling revenue from cigaret and liquor advertising has put the out-of-home industry in a race to market itself to potential new advertisers.

The starter pistol sounded in September, 1985, with the creation of Outdoor Network USA, an affiliation of 29 outdoor companies with coverage of 85% of the U.S., organized and represented by New York-based Gannett Outdoor, a division of Gannett Co., Arlington, Va. But even as the network's billings topped $10 million in April, it has critics.

The concept behind Outdoor Network is to ease the process of making national out-of-home media and production buys through regional outdoor companies.

A media buyer makes one phone call, receives a single contract and pays one invoice. Even the psychology of its name plays a role in its marketing.

"The choice of the word 'network' was no accident," says Donald Davidson, president of Gannett Outdoor. "We wanted to show that we can provide sales services through our affiliates, much the same as NBC, ABC and CBS do with theirs."

Not everyone agrees that the network idea is new or even makes sense.

Martin Mullany, president and chief executive officer of Out-of-Home Media Services, New York, says his company and its predecessor, National Outdoor Advertising Bureau, have provided the same service since 1916. And not owning outdoor plants, his company is able to make the best media buys, not just those from companies participating in the network.

"Gannett is a vendor, just like ABC. Would you go to ABC to buy your television? You tell me how stupid that sounds. It's almost laughable," Mr. Mullany says, adding that otherwise, he thinks highly of Gannett and other members of the network.

Because the network is placing ad dollars with its members, it is unlikely to seek competitive pricing or to provide objective analysis of the best buys in each market, Mr. Mullany says.

"The whole thing really is a sales tactic. I think Outdoor Network is going to evolve into a selling organization," he says. "It has to change. Advertisers aren't that stupid."

But Richard Condon, president of Naegele Outdoor, a network member, defends the concept, saying advertisers are free to place ads anywhere they want. The network is a convenience and a tool to promote the industry, he says.

"It takes a lot of people on the street to sell the concept of outdoor advertising."

Terry Myers, national sales manager with Turner Outdoor, Atlanta, also a network member, agrees.

"It's hard for us to be involved [in marketing outdoor] on a national basis when we don't have representation in New York, Chicago or Los Angeles where the major companies and agencies are located.

"The key for outdoor on a national basis is just getting into the media mix," he says.

To facilitate this, Gannett is creating business development groups solely to target potential new advertisers and a national creative department to advise them on the use of out-of-home media, Mr. Davidson says. But he recognizes that these efforts are but wobbly first steps in the struggle to convince media planners that out-of-home deserves a place in the marketing mix. Real change takes time.

"Major advertisers don't change their media plans overnight," he says. "We don't expect to make a profound difference in a few months, but as the snowball rolls down the hill, who knows?" Mr. Davidson says.

The biggest hurdle will be reorienting the industry's sales approach from one that now resembles order-taking to one that focuses on marketing, he says.

Campaign hams it up

The magic of this program is in the creativity of the outdoor advertising. We use plays on words and clever illustrations. We wanted to make friends with the market using outdoor advertising."

The puns used in Fischer's outdoor advertising are famous in the region.

One depicts a cracked egg with a slab of bacon between the halves accompanied by the slogan "Pullet Surprise" and is run the same month that Pulitzer Prizes are awarded.

The ad that runs during the Kentucky State Fair features a juicy hotdog laced with mustard and the tag line "Kentucky State Fare."

Robert J. Beggs, previously senior vp at Doe-Anderson—he recently moved to another agency—was chief resident punster for 22 years on the Fischer campaign. "And he talks like that too," Mr. Allison says. "But it's a high visibility campaign and in our agency a number of people have joined in contributing."

The outdoor campaign uses other humorous techniques as well.

What Mr. Allison calls the two "classic" Fischer boards—and the only two that are repeated seasonally—exemplify the long-running campaign's ability to humor its audience while selling its product.

The first of these two boards appears around Thanksgiving and depicts a turkey fearing for its life and imploring the public to "Serve Fischer's ham, please!" for the holidays.

On the day after New Year's, the same turkey appears on a new outdoor board in a party hat standing among falling confetti. His happy message: "Happy New Year, Fischer's ham lovers."

One series of outdoor boards, which has appeared twice in the campaign's 20 years, consists simply of the Fischer logo and the sentence: "Our 24 kinds of lunch meats make tasty orderves."

The next week, the word orderves is crossed out and respelled as horderves. The third week it is crossed out again and spelled hor durves. The fourth week, it's crossed out for the last time and replaced with the word "snacks."

This series draws public reaction, Mr. Allison says. "People call into the switchboard and say, 'You've misspelled it again.' And we just say, 'Thanks, we'll fix it.' "

Doe-Anderson produces four to six new boards a year, and several are to be introduced this spring and summer.

One shows an appetizing picture of a hot dog with the tag line, "Good dog, good dog." Another depicts a tempting club sandwich with the tag line, "Mellwood bacon belongs to all the best clubs."

The Fisher campaign is not all fun and puns, however. Doe-Anderson is quite serious in its aggressive pursuit of new boards. Currently, the outdoor campaign consists of 55 outdoor billboards.

Fifty-two of these messages are 30-sheet posters appearing on major roads; three are painted bulletins and are rotated among three expressway locations.

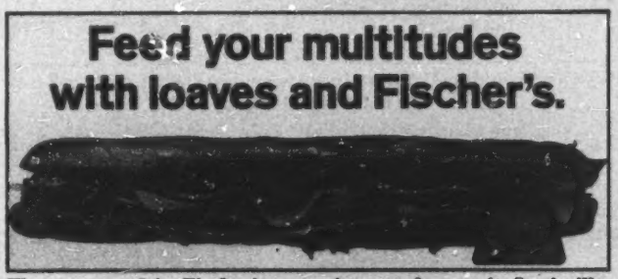
Despite the exceptionally long duration of the campaign, the company has not expanded its outdoor advertising as it would have liked because of high costs, Mr. Allison says.

Fischer is spending more than ever on outdoor advertising, although Mr. Allison declined to release any figures.

"The cost of reproduction is a key factor," he says. "That has continued to go up, as you might imagine. And when you're talking about outdoor advertising, you don't have a lot of quantity savings."

Still, Mr. Allison says, the Fischer campaign's seniority has helped to get strategic locations for the outdoor boards.

"We've had to cut considerably over the years, but what we've gained is we've been able to improve the position by being there all those years. When a new location comes along—a better location—Fischer is standing in line and gets it."



The puns used in Fischer's campaign are famous in Louisville, Ky., and several surrounding states.

creases in 1985 by companies involved in the retail and health-care categories.

Revenues from retail advertising for 30-sheet posters and painted bulletins jumped 62% in 1985, to $77 million, up from $47.4 million in 1984.

Healthcare spending reached $22 million in 1985, more than doubling the $10 million spent in 1984, according to the IOA.

"Any one of these three categories could outweigh tobacco and liquor combined in the coming years," Mr. Joyce says.

Retailers, in particular, are shifting more cooperative ad dollars to out-of-home, where they are being used for targeted buys, says Mike Horen, principal with the Co-op Advertising Information Service, Ramsey, N.J.

"National advertising doesn't sell products, it sells brands. Merchandise is sold on the local level with co-op advertising," he says.

"Anytime you see a retailer advertise anything by brand name, he's got some help," Mr. Horen says.

One reason retailers are turning to out-of-home is its low cost. Retailers typically receive 3 cents on the dollar from vendors for co-op advertising. Co-op funds accounted for 10%, or $120 million, of the outdoor industry's 1985 revenues, according to Creative Marketing Services.

But retailers are finicky, says Tom Waldkirch, product manager of outdoor advertising for Perry/Gugler, Milwaukee, a printer of outdoor posters.

"Retailers will use as many co-op dollars as they can get as long as the product being displayed is a traffic builder," Mr. Waldkirch says.

Retailers also are demanding, and getting, larger imprint areas for their own name and message, he says.

"You've got to make the retailer feel involved in the program, or he's not going to spend the co-op funds," he says.

The importance of co-op is not lost on Baton Rouge, La.-based Lamar Corp., which covers 550 cities in 15 states. Fully 21% of Lamar's $60 million in revenues for fiscal 1985, ended Oct. 21, were from co-op programs.

In 1986, co-op revenues at Lamar could account for 25% of gross revenues, says Tracy Field, director-marketing research and co-op advertising.

Lamar is one of the few outdoor companies that tracks co-op spending, and its findings are eye-openers. For example, in Paducah, Ky., 52% of outdoor revenues are from co-op, while in Dayton, O., it's about 15%. Baton Rouge is more typical in the 18% to 20% range, Ms. Field says.

Lamar began tracking co-op in 1984 when revenues plunged for tobacco and liquor ads. The company's effort to tap every available co-op dollar has paid off so well that Lamar operates a toll-free hotline to act as a clearinghouse for information about co-op programs and to keep tabs on client accruals.

Tobacco advertising has been the out-of-home industry's mainstay since cigaret advertising was banned from tv in January, 1971.

However, socia' trends in health and fitness have undermined the markets for cigarets and liquor, out-of-home's second leading category, resulting in advertising cutbacks.

Where tobacco in 1980 represented 43%, or $301 million, of the 30-sheet and painted bulletin's $701 million in revenues, it accounted for only 31%, or $378 million, of the industry's $1.2 billion in 1985 revenues. Likewise, alcoholic beverage advertising fell from 19% of industry revenues in 1980 to 11% in 1985, all according to the IOA.

While tobacco and liquor industries still rank first and second in dollars spent on out-of-home media, the industry is weaning itself from their influence by aggressively seeking a broad base in new ad categories, such as retail, business-to-business, consumer service, healthcare and package goods.

But giving up liquor and cigarets isn't easy, especially when these companies regularly make large buys in major markets.

"The cigaret and liquor business has been a godsend, a blessing financially," says Richard Condon, president of Naegele Outdoor Advertising.

"By the same token, it has made our management people and sales staff lazy and lax. We have really forgotten how to work for business and how to sell.

"We're going to have to become people who market the out-of-home product," he says.

Most outdoor executives agree that the real problem has been an industry failure to market out-of-home to leading advertisers, rather than a failure of advertisers to consider it.

Education is the answer to convincing agencies and advertisers how to plan for using outdoor, says Richard Asch, Asch Advertising, New York, an agency specializing in out-of-home.

With all the positives going for out-of-home advertising, it should be integrated into marketing plans as a matter of course, not accident, he says.

"The big spenders are taking a real hard look at the audience erosion of tv," Mr. Asch says. "If their media planners are conscientious, they'll look at alternative media, such as out-of-home."

Associate editor/production editor Pat Gray Thomas coordinated this report on Out-of-Home Advertising.

payment with further earn-out payments, usually spread over five years and linked to the acquired company's future profits. Saatchi executives estimate the company will have to pay $120 million during the next five years if profit targets are reached. Analysts at London stockbroker James Capel put the deferred payments considerably higher at $150 million. Both estimates were made before the purchase of B&S—for $50 million initially and up to $50 million in deferred performance-related payments—and several earlier acquisitions.

- Saatchi has to live up to a dazzling performance in 1985, when pretax profits rose by 121% to $50.2 million. This year, analysts are forecasting pretax profits of $39 million for the six months ended March 30 (the official results have not been announced) and $101 million for the year ending in September.

"If Saatchi wants to maintain earnings-per-share growth, they have to acquire something because organic growth is unlikely to achieve it," Mr. Johnson said. "If Saatchi slips under 20% earnings-per-share growth, the stock will become unpopular."

The question often raised about Saatchi is whether the group can maintain a high growth rate over the long term and, if not, whether a slowdown or a poor year would spell disaster given the future financial commitments and the high expectations surrounding the group.

"The protection for Saatchi is that if profits don't go up, they don't pay [deferred payments] anymore," said a New York-based consultant. "The standards are usually pretty stiff—like 12% to 15% a year. If Saatchi acquired a business for 10 times earnings and the business doesn't grow, it's disappointing but not a financial disaster."

For example, Saatchi bought the Hay Group, a U.S. management consulting group with 100 offices in 27 countries, in December, 1984, for $100 million. Hay gets up to $25 million more after 1987 if pretax profits have averaged at least $21.5 million for three years. If the average per year is less than $16.5 million, Hay gets nothing.

One pitfall is the earn-out arrangement encourages the sellers to run companies to maximize short-term growth and profit, said the New York consultant. Another problem is that Saatchi's efforts to build management in with golden handcuffs do not always work—the three principals at Yankelovich, Skelly and White, now renamed YSL, left soon after the purchase by Saatchi.

"I think Saatchi is too big and well diversified to suffer if one or two divisions don't deliver the results planned," said Grieveson Grant's Mr. Johnson.

The Saatchi & Saatchi holding company, of which Charles Saatchi, 42, and Maurice Saatchi, 39, own a total of 10%, is the darling of London's financial community.

"I don't think American agencies have paid the same attention to shareholders and institutions as the Saatchis have ever since they had a public quotation," said Ron Leagas, a former managing director of Saatchi in London.

Saatchi also has embraced the concepts of globalization and diversification as though the Saatchis invented them.

"American agencies were doing it for years but not telling anyone," Mr. Leagas said. "Saatchi has stolen their thunder."

Under the diversification strategy, Saatchi's consulting division now accounts for 30% of total revenue and 29% of profits before tax, with the communications division still representing 70% of revenue and 71% of pretax profits. Saatchi in 1985 earned 62% of revenue in the U.S. and only 24% in the U.K.

In a recent statement, Saatchi said the group now has a management team capable of running a business several times larger than Saatchi's current size.

"Saatchi has an absolutely unbounded, avaricious desire to be the biggest in everything they do," Mr. Leagas said. "They don't see any reason why they should be second best at anything."# bach (9.6%).

Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligott Rice was named the hottest agency by 6% of respondents, dislodging Chiat/Day, which led in the category each of the previous four quarters.

Chiat/Day was named by 2.6% of respondents last quarter.

Dallas-based Tracy-Locke, named by 2.3% of the people questioned, broke into the top three among the hottest agencies for the first time.

Tracy-Locke also received six mentions as the best agency (compared with four for FMR and three for Chiat/Day).

When the ad directors were asked to name the best agencies in creativity, media, marketing, research and quality of account executives and top management, JWT was No. 1 in five of the six categories, as it has been in every survey period. But JWT ranked second in creativity for the first time in the latest survey. It previously ranked third or lower.

Chiat/Day, which had been second in three previous quarters and tied for first in the April-June, 1985, survey, fell to fourth in creativity, behind No. 3 Doyle Dane Bernbach.

Ogilvy & Mather was No. 1 in creativity in the latest survey, as it has been in each survey period.

Ad agencies still seem to be doing little advertising for themselves that creates an impression. Nearly half of the respondents said they had not seen any agency ads. JWT was virtually the only agency whose ads for itself were remembered; 3% of responders said they had seen them. In the past, several executives from rival agencies have attributed JWT's leadership in this survey section to the spillover effect of the JWT ad campaign.#

Ad spending fails to equal predictions

But '85 total did outpace economy

By ROBERT J. COEN

Final returns for the year show that advertising growth in 1985 was lower than projected back in December and considerably less than expected a year ago.

Consider the outlook observations we made a year ago (AA, May 6, '85):

"Last year [1984] was definitely a boom year for advertising, and a more moderate growth rate must be expected for 1985. . .It appears likely that advertising growth will still manage to outpace the expected growth of 7.5% to 8% for the gross national product in 1985. Ad spending probably will rise by close to 10% in 1985 with the grand total for all media rising to more than $96 billion."

Expectations for both economic and ad growth were continuously revised downward as 1985 unfolded. By midyear, the ad growth forecast was revised down to 9.1% and by early December, when nine months of actual reports were available, the projection was down to 8.3%.

Now that the fourth-quarter final reports are in, it is apparent that 1985 ad spending failed to pass the $95 billion mark and the final growth rate was lower than expected, at 7.9%.

However, '85 brought much less inflation and real growth than expected; instead of the GNP rising between 7.5% and 8%, it was up only 5.7%. The percentage increase in ad spending was significantly less than expected, but the final rate of ad growth still managed to outspace the actual '85 GNP growth by better than two percentage points.

Compared with the economy and most other industries, 1985 was relatively good for advertising. But the year was quite disappointing to many in the media industry.

Ad budgets tightened noticeably throughout 1985 as the economic expansion slowed and new advertising demand failed to appear at the pace experienced in the past.

The balance between media supply and demand shifted in favor of the buyer, and the "seller's" market of the past began to change for many media.

Effect of disinflation

Disinflation, or the significant lowering of the rate of price increases, began to affect parts of the U.S. economy in the closing months of 1981.

But the arrival of disinflation on media pricing was delayed because of the strong surge of ad demand that accompanied the 1983 economic expansion followed by the 1984 Olympics.

Advertising demand leveled off by 1985, while new media such as cable tv, inserts, presorted mailings and barter syndication came on stream to swell the supply of buyer choices.

Disinflation's arrival affected all media, but its greatest impact was on network tv. Many large network-tv advertisers had been forced to hold the line on their own pricing for years, and in '85 many cut back their network budgets or refused to pay higher prices.

The run-up in media prices in contrast to the advertiser's own prices triggered the media price rebellion.

This condition is illustrated by the fact that the Consumer Price Index for food products had risen only 12% from 1981 to '85 while the comparable cumulative run-up in prime time network tv commercials costs was nearly 50%.

The poor performance of the networks in '85 was partially due to the fact that it was a post-Olympic year, but there have been other post-Olympic years since 1971 that did not suffer revenue declines.

Disinflation also struck in '85, and that is why the networks had their first decline since the departure of cigaret ads in '71.

All the other media also have begun to feel the pinch of disinflation.

Magazine revenues grew only 4.5% as many books experienced ad page declines and growing pressure for more favorable special rates and discounts.

Newspapers faced similar conditions. National advertisers cut back schedules in many markets and shifted dollars from run-of-press to inserts to offset rate increases.

Local advertising, newspapers' main source of revenue, rose only 6.7% in '85 despite linage gains for inserts and classified. The local retailers also are obviously refusing to pay significantly higher rates for r.o.p. display ads.

Fourth-quarter slowdown

Fourth-quarter advertising growth was more modest than previously expected, and a significant reexpansion in activity did not occur.

The pre-Christmas promotion period was shortened in 1985 because of the later-than-usual date of Thanksgiving. The fourth-quarter newspaper advertising revenue growth was 25% lower than the annual rate and the unexpected weakness in local newspaper spending was the main reason for the final downward revision of total ad growth to 7.9%.

Ad spending growth in the fourth quarter also was below the annual average for spot tv and magazines, while network tv improved less than previously expected.

Nevertheless, the trend line continued in the upward direction, and though no boom appears to be on the horizon, an orderly and more stable growth can be expected in the months ahead.

A relatively good year

In summary, the final figures for 1985 turned out to be lower than expected a year ago.

Many people in the media business were quite disappointed by last year's results. However, when the facts are fully examined and considered in contrast to all the economic realities, it is evident that the advertising industry had a relatively good year.

Ad growth significantly outpaced economic growth even though there were some temporary and unique disruptions in the trends.

Advertising is going through a period of transition with a temporary emphasis on disinflation in marketing budgeting.

But eventually marketers will shift their attention back to expanding the growth of their products and market shares as the only term process for growing their businesses.

In 1986, I expect advertising again to outstrip economic growth, but I think the two percentage point differential could shrink a bit more before it begins to widen again.

The current consensus economic expectations for 1986 cluster around a GNP growth of between 6% and 7%. Based on these economic expectations and the current indicators of the ad trends, I expect ad spending to rise about 8% this year to a level of at least $102 billion.

At the moment, I expect that a similar level of growth could push the '87 total up to about $110 billion before another possibly sharper upsurge occurs in the 1988 Olympic year.

McCann subsidiary eyes regional work

By STEWART ALTER

McCann-Erickson North America is going for the franchise with the creation of McCann-Erickson Regional Marketing, a subsidiary designed to build regional advertising business.

The $17 million agency, embracing seven offices and headquarters in Atlanta, replaces M-E's Communications Counselors Network, an eight-city field office operation that has chiefly served Coca-Cola USA bottlers for the past 25 years.

A key target of the new organization is franchise business. McCann noted that the nation's 500,000 franchise businesses, with $529 billion in sales, experienced 60% growth since 1980 and account for a third of all U.S. retail sales.

M-E Regional will serve local Century 21 real estate offices from all eight of its locations. The Atlanta office will serve Buick dealers associations, Haagen-Dazs Shoppes Co. and Domino's Pizzas in the Southeast.

"The new organization is a recognition of a much more regional approach to marketing today," said Dwight Shelton, 43, former general manager of CCN and now president of M-E Regional.

"Too often, marketers are tied to a national plan that doesn't always meet regional or local consumer needs," said Jay McNamara, president of McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

The new agency "is designed to develop effective and efficient marketing plans and programs for franchise and retail businesses by emphasizing more of a bottom-up approach and not just a top-down planning process," he said.

M-E Regional will be a full-service, separate agency network with creative and research, but will use McCann's existing local broadcast buying operations around the nation.

Saatchi conflict approach faces big test

An Advertising Age roundup

With its acquisition of Ted Bates Worldwide, Saatchi & Saatchi has set up a major test of its benign approach to competing accounts.

In the Saatchi scheme of things, parallel agency networks, operating independently, should blunt client fears of conflicting loyalties. This concept has led the Saatchis to select their agency buyout targets with what some see as great daring, a "why worry about conflict?" attitude.

With the Procter & Gamble/Colgate-Palmolive problem apparently headed for a resolution with the expected departure of Colgate from Bates, Saatchi's networks still will handle competing cigarets, automobiles, financial services, fast-food, beer, consumer electronics, computer retailing, insurance, candy and spirits (AA, May 5).

In fast food, Campbell-Mithun (owned by Bates) handles International Dairy Queen's $20 million account, and Dancer Fitzgerald Sample (recently merged with S&S' Dorland Advertising) handles Wendy's International, a $100 million piece of business. Said DQ vp-marketing Garry See: "We have no initial hesitation. However, should Saatchi & Saatchi agencies become more involved in Bates and its subsidiaries, we would have to reconsider."

In the food area, Backer & Spielvogel handles about $55 million in Quaker Oats Co. business; Campbell-Mithun (Bates) has $30 million in General Mills' billings.

Though the acquisition is not regarded as a major problem at Minneapolis-based General Mills, the account itself is considered already shaky for other reasons. General Mills has been losing ground to Kellogg Co. in the cereal area, and C-M's work on granola bars has failed to please the company of late. Some of that business has already been shifted to Needham Harper Worldwide. Additionally, Needham has Mills' Wheaties, and Dancer Fitzgerald Sample (affiliated with Saatchi's Dorland already) is the company's major agency on ready-to-eat cereals.

Interestingly, Needham is merging with DDB, which handles several Nabisco cereals.

In the beer category, Bates is now involved in a creative review for one account, Anheuser-Busch's Michelob, and Saatchi & Saatchi recently bought Backer & Spielvogel, a major Miller Brewing Co. agency. An Anheuser-Busch executive's only comment on the situation was terse: "This is something agencies have to work out for themselves."

Bates' move to the Saatchi network roster will result in three cigaret companies in the S&S camp. Lorillard has its True brand at DFS Dorland, R.J. Reynolds has its Salem brand at Bates subsidiary William Esty Co., and Philip Morris has its Parliament at Backer & Spielvogel.

Lorillard and PM have peacefully coexisted under the Saatchis since April, when B&S was bought by the Saatchis.

Asked about potential conflicts, William Campbell, exec vp-marketing at Philip Morris USA, said: "We are a megacompany, so we should expect mega-agencies." Reynolds would not comment.

Hyundai Motor America, the Garden Grove, Cal.-based U.S. arm of the Korean newcomer in the auto market, already addressed the conflict issue when Saatchi purchased its agency, B&S. The company is unconcerned about the Bates acquisition. "We don't feel it will be a problem or a conflict; [it] will make no difference in our daily lives," said Hyundai director of marketing Jack Collins.

But Toyota Motor Sales was more cautious. The Torrance, Cal., Japanese auto importer faced the conflict problem earlier, when Saatchi began a phased merger of the Toyota agency, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, with its Dorland unit. But Bates' William Esty Co. subsidiary handles U.S. advertising for arch-rival Nissan Motor Corp.

"This is closer to our backyard," said George Borst, Toyota corporate marketing manager. A Nissan spokesman said the company does not see any conflict of interest at this time, although he noted that it will study the situation; Nissan marketing executives could not be reached.

Apart from any Toyota-Nissan "corporate" conflict growing out of the deal, there is already an apparently strained relationship between Nissan and Esty. In recent months, Nissan has put $25 million behind the introduction of its new Hardbody truck line, but substantial sales have yet to materialize. According to Automotive News, Nissan truck sales dropped 27.8% in the first quarter of 1986, compared to the same period a year earlier, despite this heavy promotional spending and incentive financing. Toyota, on the other hand, showed a 18.6% gain during that same time.

Pioneer Electronics, Long Beach, Cal., a DFS client, seemed unconcerned about the merger, despite its conflict with Panasonic, a Bates account. "My initial reaction is that it's far enough apart, that it's okay," said manager of advertising Karen Rodgers. "At this moment, I don't anticipate a problem."

Ms. Rodgers said she thinks all advertisers are going to have to rethink their posture on the conflict issue. "This is going to happen. We're all going to have to deal with it."

Saatchi

BBDO and Bates, which gain no additional resources through their deals, have been moving as quickly as they have.

This acquisition is expected to test how much clients are willing to tolerate in the way of conflicts. While Bates and its subsidiaries, such as William Esty Co., will remain independent, the purchase brings into the same agency-owned family of networks many competitive advertisers and products—Toyota and Nissan, Tylenol and Anacin, to name a few (see story above). There will be some soul-searching and decisions by companies such as Colgate-Palmolive, which reportedly has $100 million around the world through Bates and was Bates' starter account in 1940, and Procter & Gamble, which has about twice that through Saatchi & Saatchi Compton and DFS Dorland Worldwide.

Reuben Mark, president-ceo, Colgate-Palmolive, said the company would consider all alternatives in the event that its relationship with Bates is terminated. On May 9, Mr. Mark said that he had not received any word from Bates that it intended to resign the account, nor had he decided to dismiss the agency. "We will, of course, do whatever is in the best interest of the company," he said.

Bates handles Colgate toothpaste, Palmolive soap and dishwashing liquid, Palmolive Rapid Shave and additionally serves as Colgate's lead agency in the Far East. Young & Rubicam and Foote, Cone & Belding are Colgate's other major agencies.

Considering where Saatchi now stands, it's hard to believe that Saatchi entered the U.S. and the top 10 agency rankings for the first time only four years ago, when it acquired Compton Communications. In the last two months, Saatchi has grown dramatically.

It struck a complex financial deal that merged Dancer Fitzgerald Sample with its Dorland subsidiary to create DFS Dorland Worldwide via a $75 million "loan" (AA, March 3) and it shelled out an initial $50 million in cash to buy Backer & Spielvogel (AA, April 21). Both of those involve future payouts as well.

But those deals only advanced Saatchi to second place behind the Interpublic Group of Cos. The BBDO-DDB-Needham merger made that agency group the largest with $5 billion in worldwide billings, only now to be surpassed by Saatchi, which is 50% larger. Saatchi's billings are in three worldwide networks (Ted Bates, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, and DFS Dorland) as well as three other strong agencies in New York (Backer & Spielvogel, William Esty Co., McCaffrey & McCall) and others around the U.S. and in the U.K.

The Saatchi desire to be No. 1 was fueled by its early recognition that agencies outside the very largest groups would be vulnerable because global megacompanies would want to work with a few global mega-agencies. The Saatchi brothers, Maurice and Charles, contend that to be one of the mega-agencies would be a rich prize and would give that agency a strong and secure position for many years to come, one not likely to be reversed.

Now that they have reached this pinnacle, the Saatchis will not be making any further major agency acquisitions—for the time being. They will work on sharpening and consolidating management.

Saatchi is now expected to turn to its other major goal, which is building its consulting division. In November, 1984, Saatchi bought the Hay Group, one of the world's largest management consulting organizations, for about $100 million. It was a move with which Saatchi redefined its corporate goal as being not just in advertising and communications, but in a full range of business services.

Last year, Saatchi restructured its company into a communications and a consulting division and has been building its depth of senior management with new leaders for those divisions.

The Bates acquisition uses up about two-thirds of the $600 million in cash Saatchi raised on April 14 through a rights issue, offering at a discount new shares to those already holding various classes of Saatchi stock.

The Saatchi-Bates talks came to light five months ago, just after they had collapsed (AA, Dec. 16). Mr. Jacoby noted then, "The price they offered was fair, but the 'earn-out' was so contingent that we didn't want to get caught up in anything like that." Sources indicate that Mr. Jacoby's concern with the contingency payout had to do with how conflicts would shake out. His thinking reportedly was that the buyer should take the risk on conflicts rather than the seller, who would lose out in future earnings payments if conflicts fallout reduced profits.

At the time, Mr. Jacoby explained that the talks had come about as a result of the agency's having hired a financial consultant a year earlier. That consultant, Ned Pugh, a former chief financial officer at Avon Products, was hired to develop a "strategy plan" for the agency on matters such as how to "recycle our own shares" among employes and how to build capital and make acquisitions.

Mr. Jacoby said that as an outgrowth of that, he had received offers from outside investors, both individuals and companies, but that selling the agency was not his intention. Several investment companies, including Allen & Co. and Warburg, Pincus Counsellors, reportedly also came to the agency with offers to take it public or find private investors.

As Mr. Jacoby has previously indicated (AA, April 8, '85), he owns 26,000 of the 400,000 Class A shares in Bates. But it's not just that 6.5% ownership that explains his wealth. He also owns all of the 30,000 B shares, which are the voting shares in the company, and reportedly has an option on 75,000 of an additional 100,000 shares available in the company. Mr. Jacoby took over the agency in the 1960s when it billed only $165 million.

While Saatchi is known never to give up interest in an acquisition, even after several rejections, until a few weeks ago its attention was focused on Doyle Dane Bernbach. It made many previous overtures to DDB, including a last-minute offer before DDB chose to make a deal with BBDO and Needham instead. The Saatchi offer, rejected by the DDB board, was said to be $30 a share, a little higher on a share basis than the deal DDB ultimately bought.

Following that rejection, Saatchi returned to Bates, apparently this time with the new payout plan. Interpublic also then became interested in Bates, but reportedly decided on the evening of May 6 not to pursue the deal, which it regarded as too expensive considering the risks. It was not until the evening of May 8 that Bates agreed to the sale and signed the letter of agreement. The public announcement was scheduled to be made today.

Jacoby's temperament puts him at Bates' helm

New York—Ted Bates Worldwide chairman and president-ceo Robert Jacoby, 58, has controlled the agency so long that when he agreed to talk to the Saatchis this month—reversing earlier responses—this act alone was interpreted as tantamount to a deal.

Mr. Jacoby steered Bates to a 9.2% billings growth last year, at $3.1 billion, and more recently added Kobs & Brady, the Chicago-based direct-marketing agency, to a roster that he had already expanded to include AC&R Advertising, Campbell-Mithun, Diener/Hauser/Bates, William Esty Co., Sawdon & Bess and Stern Walter/Earle Ludgen. Another acquisition, McDonald & Little, didn't last.

A native of Union City, N.J., Mr. Jacoby graduated from Princeton in 1951 as a Phi Beta Kappa with a major in economics and a minor in banking.

After two years with Shell Oil's economics, transportation and supply department, he tried Procter & Gamble.

Mr. Jacoby, newly married, went to a headhunter and in 1953 was placed in a research department job at Compton Advertising. Some work Mr. Jacoby did there on a P&G product, Crisco, encouraged him to seek more experience with other package-goods accounts, and he interviewed at Bates, where he was hired to work on Warner-Lambert business.

He served for a year, then joined the old Doherty, Clifford, Steers & Shenfield agency, working on Bristol-Myers.

But Warner-Lambert and Bates executives kept after him to return to the agency, and he returned in 1965, the year its long-time leader Rosser Reeves—who championed its Unique Selling Proposition philosophy—retired.

In November, 1969, when what was then called Ted Bates & Co. was billing $350 million, it set up a separate New York operation and Mr. Jacoby was named its president. He became exec vp of the parent company in 1970 and president-chief operating officer in 1971.

Mr. Jacoby succeeded Archie Foster as chief executive officer in April, 1973, and three years later was elected chairman, again succeeding Mr. Foster.

Saatchis' unique story

London—Since founding their agency in 1970, Charles and Maurice Saatchi have not listened to conventional wisdom.

Born into an Iraqi Sephardic Jewish family, Charles, 42, and Maurice, 39, have had unconventional careers.

Their parents fled Iraq during World War II, and their father, Nathan David Saatchi, is retired from the family clothing business and lives in London.

Charles quit school at 18 and landed a series of jobs, including copywriter at Collett, Dickenson, Pearce in 1966. In 1968 he left to form a consultancy.

Maurice attended the London School of Economics and then worked as promotion manager for Campaign, a U.K. advertising trade magazine.

Charles' creative flair and Maurice's head for business have proved a formidable combination. A propensity for breaking the rules helped, too.

It was Charles' idea to position Saatchi & Saatchi as a brand, combining tough, but clever, ad copy with a cost-conscious financial image. They eschewed meeting directly with clients, but they aggressively chased, via cold telephone calls, other agencies' business.

Charles can be outgoing and engaging, but generally keeps to himself, even to the point of playing chess with associates during his lunch hour.

Maurice, on the other hand, is polite, charming, disarming and the "front man" for presenting the agency to the U.K.'s version of Wall Street. He is the brother who quietly stalks acquisitions.

Agencies surveyed

Salary sweet, but bonus bountiful

The first of a planned annual study of compensation among advertising agency executives confirms that superstars can earn big bucks. But the average salary-plus-bonus for the 1,654 executives who participated was a more down-to-earth $76,000.

Among the highlights of the study, conducted by Cole Surveys in cooperation with Advertising Age:

- Fifty-two of the 1,654 top executives (3%) received total pay of more than $250,000 (1985 salary plus bonus). The highest total cash reported was $890,200. Two others got more than $800,000; two received between $500,000 and $600,000, eight were between $400,000 and $500,000. (See Table 1.)
- Of the 1,654 participants, 221 (13%) got between $100,000 and $250,000; 685 (42%) received between $50,000 and $100,000, and 696 (42%) earned up to $50,000.
- The average total cash compensation for the year of all ad executives in the sample was $73,600.
- Cash bonuses added a substantial amount to the base salaries of hundreds of executives. The bonus received (in most cases paid in early 1985 for performance in 1984) was calculated as a per cent of the October, 1985, base salary.
- 667 of the 1,654 (40.9%) received a cash bonus during the calendar year. Those who got one averaged 21.7% of their base salary—or $16,500. The bonuses of 18 (1%) exceeded $500,000.
- Six of every 10 (61.5%) of the top brass—ceos, presidents, branch office managers and exec vps—got a bonus that averaged 32.2% of their base salary.
- Of the 10 highest-paid ceos—total pay ranging from $310,000 to $890,200, all in self-standing companies or conglomerates—eight received a cash bonus; two didn't. The eight bonuses totaled $983,000, 14.9% of the total of the eight ceo base salaries—$6,600,900.
- One ceo whose company billings were not even in the largest billing-size group hit the jackpot. His bonus came to 230% of base salary —$315,500 on a salary of $132,000—for total earnings of $447,500. From 10th place among (independent) ceos in base-salary rankings, he rose to the sixth spot in total cash on the wings of that bonus.
- Creative directors were not far behind the averages of the ceos: 41 of 68 (60.3%) got bonuses equaling 26.3% of base salary. But in the larger billing-size groups, creative heads were on a par with the bonus levels of other top-management officers. For example, in

Merger aftershocks main topic at Four A's

By STEWART ALTER

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. VA.—Even the treasurer's report at the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies' annual meeting here couldn't ignore the impact of the last three weeks of megamergers that are transforming the agency business.

As part of his report on the Four A's finances, treasurer Ron Stone, chairman of Stone, August & Co., Birmingham, Mich., claimed he had devised a way to net $1.8 billion, flashing a slide on the screen that read, "Saatchi & Saatchi—AAAA," explaining, "We sold the Four A's to the Saatchi brothers."

More Four A's coverage on Pages 112, 113 and 114.

The reference to Maurice and Charles Saatchi, who in recent weeks have electrified the industry with their buys of Backer & Spielvogel ($100 million) and Ted Bates Worldwide ($450 million-plus), was only one sign of how these acquisitions, plus last month's BBDO/Doyle Dane Bernbach/-Needham Harper Worldwide megamerger, are now dominating the thoughts of agency executives.

For certainly, as most realize, this merger activity is breaking new and potentially risky ground. Paraphrasing Richard Deupree, one of the earlier builders of Procter & Gamble, Maurice Saatchi told ADVERTISING AGE last week in an interview from London, "We have climbed to the top of a slippery pole and we can only stay there by being the best."

After announcing his agency's merger with Saatchi & Saatchi last week, Ted Bates Worldwide chairman Robert Jacoby (r.) hurried down to the Greenbrier to be installed as new chairman of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies. With him here are outgoing Four A's chairman Lou Hagopian (l.), chairman of N W Ayer, and Four A's president Len Matthews.

Gathered at the Greenbrier here for the Four A's 68th annual meeting, the members made it apparent that if there was one thing that stood out—more in the corridor talk than in the formal presentations—it was that the subject of mergers had come out of the closet.

Mixed in with the serious conjecture about how clients were reacting to this rapid consolidation of the business, and the conflict questions it poses, were clear indications of how acceptable the topic of merger had become and how prepared for it the industry has become.

There were jokes and endless rumors about who was next. A top-level J. Walter Thompson Co. executive, for example, would greet colleagues by asking them lightheartedly whether they had heard the latest—and dominant—rumor at the conference, that JWT Group and Ogilvy Group were exploring merger—a coupling being denied by both agencies.

Still, the Four A's annual gathering is a place where agency executives could stage secret rendez-

French agency sought by BBDO

First quarter winds up on 'ho-hum' note

By STEWART ALTER

Except for J. Walter Thompson USA's strong showing of 12% revenue growth, public agencies' first quarter was what analyst Charles Crane termed "ho-hum."

U.S. revenue growth for these agencies was in the 5½%-to-6% range, noted Mr. Crane, an analyst at Oppenheimer & Co., New York. He called JWT's 12% boost "spectacular" by comparison.

But parent company JWT Group's profit margins are "still disappointing," said Mr. Crane.

Agencies as a group seem to have increased expenses, he said.

Because the first quarter accounts for the smallest amount of ad agency revenues and profits, it tends not to be viewed as an indicator of what the full year holds.

But Mr. Crane observed that "it does give us our first glimpse of the cost structure for the balance of the year." In that case, he said, the generally lower first-quarter margins appear to indicate two things: Agencies have been staffing up "at the end of 1985 in anticipation of a better year in 1986," and they are giving out the wage and salary increases they held back last year.

Philip Geier Jr., chairman-ceo of the Interpublic Group of Cos., whose agency group gained $123 million in net new income in the quarter, noted the quarter's results are not necessarily indicative of the results for the full year.

Norman Brown, chairman-ceo at Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, observed: "We are pleased with FCB's first-quarter results, even acknowledging that in the advertising industry first quarters are not necessarily a good indicator of results for the full year."

Some are taking the first-quarter results as a less than hopeful sign. Grey Advertising's results "reflect. . .the fact that over-all advertising volume appears to be growing at a less than robust rate," said chairman-ceo Edward Meyer.

Ogilvy Group chairman-ceo William Phillips also noted, in looking at the first quarter, that "it appears that 1986 will be a tight year in the U.S., with very low inflation and softness in the media markets. We are paying close attention to costs to maintain our profit expectations for the year."

Mr. Phillips previously had expressed concern about the impact of disinflation on agency results when he released Ogilvy's strong yearend figures.

With Ogilvy Group's first-quarter net income actually down 9.2% to $3.2 million, Mr. Crane noted that those previous remarks apparently were "a warning sign."

From Mr. Crane's conversations with the agencies and with advertisers about ad spending forecasts, he said he is "getting the sense that the second quarter would not be that much different but that there would be a pickup on a percentage comparison basis in the second half of the year."

Agency financial results

First quarter revenue and income showed improvements over the year-ago quarter, but analysts noted profit margins were generally lower. The agencies differ about the significance of the results for the rest of 1986. Source: Advertising Age.

But it's still seeking buyout prospects

FCB: No merger pressure

By SCOTT HUME

CHICAGO—Foote, Cone & Belding Communications chairman-ceo Norman Brown said last week he feels "no pressure" to seek a merger partner in the wake of recent agency combinations, and he assured shareholders that FCB has the domestic and international strengths and size to compete.

However, after the May 13 annual meeting, president-chief operating officer Abbott Jones acknowledged FCB is "working on a variety of acquisitions in several areas" to augment its "associated companies" stable of smaller, specialty shops.

Mr. Brown told shareholders that FCB three years ago "recognized [the] requirement to be larger, stronger and truly international."

That resulted in 17 acquisitions outside the U.S. (increasing to 38 from 22 the number of countries in which it operates) in the past three years, as well the recent acquisition of Leber Katz Partners, New York.

FCB's long-term future will be determined by four factors within its control, Mr. Brown said.

Those factors are the needs to maintain an effective international network, to offer a full spectrum of communication services, to strengthen significantly FCB's position in the New York market and to maintain the high level of its creative product.

"One either gets in this high-stakes game," Mr. Brown said of the need for a strong global presence, "or one drops out of the marketing/advertising big leagues."

In remarks after the meeting, Mr. Brown said FCB will "continue to be open to any action that advances our goal of being a complete, global agency." But he expressed some reservations about the recent spate of agency mergers and acquisitions.

"The core consideration is [an agency's] strength. And size and strength are not necessarily the same thing."

Mr. Jones added: "The first way to judge [the value of such mergers] is what clients do. Some will vote with their feet, making it interesting for the rest of us."

Mr. Brown said FCB still has had no direct contact with Burbank, Cal.-based Shamrock Holdings, which now holds 9.9% of FCB's stock (AA, Feb. 13, et seq.).

However, in indirect contact through investment counselor Goldman, Sachs & Co., FCB has communicated its intention to remain independent, he said.

At the meeting, shareholders ratified a "poison pill" amendment to its certificate of incorporation—surprisingly without question or discussion—intended to lessen FCB's vulnerability to a hostile takeover.

The amendment requires that all stockholder actions be taken during an annual or special meeting of the board (which can be called only by a majority of the board, the chairman or the president).

The net effect of the amendment is to make it more difficult to acquire control of the company by removing and replacing officers and directors.

Mr. Brown also denied that any conflict of interest would be involved in former FCB chairman John O'Toole's intention to serve as exec vp-government affairs for the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies (AA, May 12) in Washington while remaining on the FCB payroll.

FCB will pay Mr. O'Toole $154,000 a year for the next five years and $114,000 annually thereafter until Jan. 31, 1994, which exec vp-finance Allan Wilson Jr. explained is deferred compensation rather than salary.

Don't overlook clients: O&M exec

By STEWART ALTER

NEW YORK—The trend to giant global agencies based on acquisition is driven by "agency ambition, not client needs," Ogilvy Group chairman-ceo William Phillips told the company's annual meeting here last week.

"It remains to be proven that clients want this accumulation of size," Mr. Phillips said at the May 13 meeting.

"Resources, not size, are key. I don't hear clients saying 'Become larger through financial maneuver.' In fact, a number have said to me that they don't understand the recent spate of mergers and acquisitions."

Ogilvy has not stood apart from the industry trends. It made 17 acquisitions in 1985 ("none in the 'mega' category," Mr. Phillips said) and 10 so far this year, including Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligott Rice.

Mr. Phillips said Ogilvy "will soon be announcing a new phase for Meridian in the Pacific" and is confident "we can develop a fourth, and possibly fifth, sector for the Ogilvy Group."

The proxy statement for the meeting showed that the five most highly compensated executive officers in '85 were the same group as the year before: Mr. Phillips, $550,000 in cash compensation, compared with $529,300 in '84; Kenneth Roman, Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide president, $525,000, versus $475,900; Norman Berry, O&M creative head and president of O&M/New York, $520,000, compared with $485,400; Graham Phillips, chairman of O&M-U.S., $472,000, up from $399,300, and Michael Bail, vice-chairman, O&M Worldwide, $460,000, up from $435,000.

Quaker tries Life preserver

By JULIE FRANZ

CHICAGO—Quaker Oats Co. is looking to pump a little life into its Life brand ready-to-eat cereal with a $2 million promotion aimed at making children into commercial directors.

A May 5 freestanding newspaper insert invited children under age 12 to submit ideas for a Life tv commercial using a blank storyboard form found inside boxes of Life and Cinnamon Life cereals.

The grand-prize winner will go to Hollywood, courtesy of Quaker, and act as assistant director on the spot. The commercial probably will air during children's Saturday morning and after-school time slots, a Quaker spokesman said. The winner also gets $10,000.

Quaker is holding a separate contest for school groups. The company mailed lesson plans and storyboards to 350,000 art teachers of students aged 4 through 7.

The marketer chose the promotion because it appealed to both kids and adults. Life, Quaker's No. 2-selling cereal, has lost share in the $4.4 billion ready-to-eat cereal market as Kellogg Co., Battle Creek, Mich., and General Mills, Minneapolis, inundate the market with new products and ad dollars.

Life's share dropped just below 2% this year after holding a steady 2.2% share for several years, said Jack Maxwell, an industry analyst with Furman Selz Major Dietz & Birney, New York.

Quaker director of promotions Peter Consolazio, who also is vice-chairman of the Promotion Marketing Assn. of America, has left the company to pursue outside interests. Promotion manager Mary Whalan is stepping in as acting director-promotions.

Addenda to Foreign Agency issue

The following additions and corrections are for listings appearing in the Foreign Agency Income issue (AA, April 21). Figures are in millions of dollars.

- The Brazil chart should have carried a footnote reading: "AA altered its procedure of determining an agency's "real growth" (applying 1985 exchange rate to 1984 returns) because it primarily shows the impact of inflation in that economy. Dollar figures for 1984 are based on the average annual exchange rate (0.0007) of that year.
- Allen, Brady & Marsh, London, was listed twice. Correct figures are $8,292.0 for 1985 gross income and $54,601.8 for 1985 billings, putting the agency in 26th place.
- Hettinga, de Lang, Possel, de Boers, Amsterdam: 1985 gross income $886.8 on billings of $5,912.0, which lists that agency in 29th place. Both figures are estimates.
- Barretts, Capetown, South Africa: Gross income $555.6 and billings $3,346.4, ranking the agency in 14th place.
- Leo Burnett-France, Paris, 1985 billings should have read $15,814.0.
- Noordervliet & Winninghoff/Leo Burnett, Amsterdam: Billings for 1985 should read $27,800.3.
- Reklam Moran, Istanbul, an Ogilvy & Mather affiliate, submitted erroneous figures. Figures for 1985 should have read $932.4 for gross income and $6,405.0 for billings, ranking the agency seventh.
- Manajans/Thompson, Istanbul: Gross income for 1985 should read $2,710.3.
- Atlas Publicidad, Bogota, a J. Walter Thompson affiliate: billings figures for 1985 should have read $14,115.4.
- McCann-Erickson and J. Walter Thompson, both in Frankfurt, should have shown 1985 billings of $135,735.0 and $126,973.5, respectively; 1984 billings should have read $121,501.0 and $126,475.3.

Due to a computer error, the following agencies were omitted from the listings:

- Carvis Needham, Madrid/Barcelona: 1985 gross income $1,693.3, 54% increase over 1984; 1985 billings $10,340.0, putting Carvis in 24th place.
- Dr. Kosdorf & Partner, Vienna (Needham affiliate): 1985 gross income $570.0, 74% increase over 1984; 1985 billings $3,800.0, putting the agency in 18th place.
- Bergenholz & Arnesen, Copenhagen: 1985 gross income $944.0, 5% increase over 1984; 1985 billings $11,192.4, putting the agency in 17th place.
- BCP Strategy Creativity, Montreal: 1985 gross income $5,362.8, 35% increase over 1984; 1985 billings $35,751.3, putting BCP in 17th place.
- Publicis Intermarco-Farner, Frankfurt: 1985 gross income $7,110.0, 5% increase over 1984; 1985 billings $47,400.0, putting Publicis in 15th place.#

agencies billing more than $100 million, 78.9% received bonuses that averaged $40,800 each, or 27.8% of base.

- Clearly, bonuses played a big role in four of the five size groups. In the smallest agencies, with billings up to $5 million, only two in ten executives got one. In the next three size groups, agencies with billings of $5 million to $100 million, five of ten got them. In the more-than-$100 million class, 35.1% received an incentive in the calendar year.
- While there was some size-group variation in the percentage of those receiving a bonus, there was little difference in the average ratio of bonus-to-base pay. Those who received a bonus averaged close to the 20% of base mark in all size groups, including the smallest. (See Table 2.)

Between Dec. 31, 1984, and Oct. 1, 1985, those who received a base salary increase averaged 13.4%. This is 10.4% higher than the 3% rise in the cost of living for the period. It also exceeds by a sizable margin pay increases given in most other industries for a full 12 months.

- Topping the list with an average of 18.7% were the smallest shops (Group A), with billings of up to $5 million. Next in line were the Group B agencies, in the $5 million category, which averaged base salary increases of 16.6%.
- The next three size groups were bunched between 11.4% and 13.0%. (See Table 3.)

As a statistic, highest cash by position tells more than just who is on top. First, it is a real number, the amount someone actually received for services rendered. Second, it is an indication of how an industry values positions relative to each other. Third, it provides an interesting—if not perfect—comparison with other "un-like" industries.

Example: The highest-paid chief financial officer on our list earns total cash compensation of $425,200, second only to the survey's highest-paid ceo, one who runs a huge, self-standing agency conglomerate. The chief financial officer's earnings are also ahead—by a goodly amount—of other over-all managers, such as president-chief operating officer, exec vp and agency subsidiary ceo. His $425,200 is 31% higher than the $324,000 paid to banking's No. 1 chief financial officer. And he is 205% higher than the $140,000 paid to his opposite number in hospital administration.

More significantly, the highest-paid chief financial officer got 27% more in 1985 than the industry's highest paid creative director, a sure sign that the financial officer post in some of the largest agencies is highly valued. As agencies develop into huge conglomerates, especially when maintaining separate and decentralized subsidiaries, the executive who can get a handle on the control function, keep a lid on costs and affect the bottom line becomes the pivotal person.

Billing size key variable

While agency size tells more about how people are paid than almost any other factor, location in or near major ad centers—New York, Chicago, Los Angeles—also affects both salary and bonus levels. Here is a look at compensation for the 19 positions we broke out. (See Table 7.)

Chief executive officers (II and I): Cash compensation may be only part of a ceo's compensation. There are other "perks"—such as a company car.

For each top executive, size of agency makes a difference. In the largest companies, three of every four have a company car; in the smallest, it's one out of three.

Pensions, too, are much more likely to be part of the ceo's package in the largest companies—92% are in this kind of retirement plan. In the smallest companies, 59% offer pensions. (See Table 4.)

When it comes to pay levels, the averages show sharp upward movement among agency groups. The compensation for independent agency heads (ceo IIs) in the smallest size group is $68,100. It is $84,100 in the $5 million-to-$10 million group; $138,000 in the $10 million-to-$25 million group; $256,800 in the $25 million-to-$100 million group and $515,300 in the largest agencies.

But there are exceptions. In the smallest-size group, one ceo II made $141,600 last year. Yet his agency was last in the billings rankings among the nine companies reported. What's more, the $141,600 was higher than that received by any ceo II in the next-largest-size group and above the average ($138,400) in the $10 million-to-$25 million class.

The compensation of ceos of subsidiary companies follows a similar pattern, rising with agency size. Since subsidiary ceos tend to work for the larger agencies, they benefit more from some "exotic" pay-plan features than the heads of many independents. Thus, 86% of them received bonuses while 58% of the independent agency ceos did so. Their bonuses as a per cent of base, however, were identical—34.9%.

Presidents, chief operating officers and exec vps: The total cash received by the 45 presidents ranged from $67,500 in the smallest agencies to $246,300 in the large. Pay for presidents in the three smallest groups showed little size variation—Group A: $67,500; Group B: $69,000; Group C: $88,600. The average jumps to $165,700 in Group D ($25 million-to-$100 million), and to $246,300 in the over-$100 million Group E.

Forty-nine per cent of the presidents-chief operating officers received an incentive that averaged 29.3% of base. In the more-than-$100 million group, 71% got bonuses that averaged 34.4% of base.

The 51 exec vps in the survey received average pay of $99,100, or 22.3% below the average president-chief operating officer. Three of every four exec vps received an incentive, higher than for any position except subsidiary ceos and well ahead of the 58% received by independent ceo IIs. In the three largest-size groups, 30 of 34, or 88%, of the exec vps received incentives that came to 38.3% of their base pay.

Branch office managers: The 44 branch office managers reported by 26 agencies average $92,400 in pay; 57% received a 23.5% bonus. In agencies less than $100 million, their average bonus was 14.5%.

Chief financial officers: Our superstar chief financial officer and his $425,200 in pay is established as a trendsetter, pointing to a growing emphasis on controls and profitability. At present, the trend is visible only in the largest agencies, where the 10 chief financial officers reported average pay of $166,800, a hair above the $165,700 received by eight exec vps. Below $100 million, however, chief financial officers fall off sharply relative to exec vps.

Creative directors and associate creative directors: Twenty-nine of the 68 creative directors (43%) earned more than $100,000 in 1985. Six (9%) are paid more than $250,000. Three of the six (4%) are in the $300,000-plus bracket. The top three received an average base salary of $231,000, to which was added a bonus of $95,000 (41.1% of base) for total cash averaging $326,000. Only independent ceo IIs (with 12) report more in the more-than-$300,000 tier.

The average creative director received $109,500, but this figure was very much a product of billing-size mix. The two smaller-size groups averaged $49,800 and $47,400, respectively, in total cash. Their pay in the larger-size basic salary groups steadily increased—Group C: $78,000; Group D: $126,300, Group E: $172,300.

Associate creative directors averaged $83,800 in base plus bonus. Bonuses for associates came to 11.5% of base, compared with 26.3% for the directors.

More charts on Page 34.

Senior art directors and senior copywriters: The averages for these positions run neck and neck; only $100 separates the two. The 163 senior art directors are at $50,400, the 126 senior copywriters are at $50,300.

In the largest agencies, senior art directors average $60,300, while the senior copywriters average $59,100.

In all size groups, about one in five in these senior creative jobs received an incentive of 8% of base. In the largest agencies, seven of 76 senior art directors (9.2%) got 9.9% bonuses; nine of 61 senior copywriters (14.8%) got bonuses that averaged 10.6% of salary.

Directors of account management and senior account execs: Unlike the creative directors, where six earned more than $250,000 and three were more than $300,000, only one account management director went above $250,000. A salary of $180,000 and a 50% bonus of $90,000 brought total pay for this industry leader to $270,000.

The percentage of account management heads who received a bonus was 59%, virtually tied with creative directors. Average bonuses, however, were 20% of base—just below the 26.3% received by the creative directors.

The average compensation for account directors was $99,200. In $100-million agencies, the average total cash was $128,700.

tives averaged $52,400 and 31% got bonuses of 16.1%. Agency size made less difference here: Group A: $27,100; Group B: $39,300; Group C: $44,100; Group D: $54,500; Group E: $59,400. Only $15,300 separated the Group C ($10 million-to-$25 million) average from the Group E (more than $100 million) average. This 35% difference in the averages is much smaller than that recorded for the same two size groups in associate creative director (82%), senior art director (50%) and senior copywriter (61.8%).

Media directors and associate media directors: Steep climbs based on agency size characterize the pay levels of these positions. Average media director pay was $57,600, with 43% receiving incentives of 19.1% of base.

The average may not be representative of what is really going on, since the pay for these positions is weighted heavily by the fact that 37 of the 65 (57% of the total) are from the smaller companies. The average pay of the 37 is $33,900. By contrast, the average pay of those in Group D was $64,400 and in Group E, $141,000. The nine highest paid are at agencies billing more than $100 million; their pay ranges from $101,500 to $275,000. In the largest agencies, 78% of the media directors received bonuses of 28.2%.

Sixty-five associate media directors earned an average of $48,100 and 28% got bonuses of 9.2%.

Broadcast production managers and print production managers: The 27 broadcast production managers averaged $62,600; 52% received bonuses of 12%. In the largest-size group, average total pay was $86,300 and one of every two got a 13.3% bonus.

The average pay of 60 print production managers ranged from $27,200 to $52,100. Forty-two per cent received bonuses of 13%.

This is another position with a relatively flat curve among the size groups of agencies. Nine of the 60 reported (15%) earn more than $50,000. Five of the nine work for agencies with less than $100 million in billings.

Market research managers: Here's a position for which size of agency hardly counts at all. For example: The 17 market research managers in the $25 million-to-$100 million group average $63,400, just $500 less than the $63,900 the 31 managers in the more-than-$100 million group receive.

There is not much pattern to incentives, either. Over-all, 37% received a 16.8% bonus. Average pay for all 62 is $60,100. This is a position whose pay is directly related to the individual rather than the agency size.

Public relations managers: The 33 public relations managers reported in the survey averaged $53,600. Seventeen (51.5%) received bonuses of 12.3%. There was a direct correlation with agency billings—Group B: $35,100; Group C: $49,600; Group D: $59,400; Group E: $65,400.

Traffic managers: Average pay for the 56 reported is $26,500. A good benchmark job—with little variation based on agency size. One in four (23.2%) received a modest bonus in 1985—6.1% of base salary. One manager earned $56,200.

Top ten compensation

No two agencies are precisely alike, even when—or perhaps especially when—they are both subsidiaries of the same parent. Each agency has its own special strengths that affect the kind of business it goes after. These lead to differences in how each is organized—that is, where positions fall in the top-management hierarchy.

In Agency A, an exec vp handles the creative function with a creative director reporting to him. In Agency B, all the top creative team leaders report on a solid-line basis to the ceo, who wants to be involved in all major creative decisions affecting certain clients; there is no one person charged with responsibility of the creative director. In Agency C, a vice-chairman handles high-level creative activity; the chairman-ceo looks after management and acquisitions and is hardly involved in the details of client campaigns.

Because of this organizational diversity, it's useful to look at the aggregate compensation of the 10 highest paid in management without regard to position. Now agencies A, B and C can be compared with one another on how each compensates its 10 highest-paid executives, both as individuals and in total.

As with the 19 title comparisons, billing size has the greatest impact on executive pay, for the top 10 varies from $353,700 ($35,370 per executive) in the smallest billings-size group—up to $5 million in billings—to $2.01 million ($201,240 per individual) in the more-than-$100 million group.

But as with most industries, pay doesn't exactly keep pace with size. For example, it takes $1 million to pay the top 10 in an agency billing $57.3 million (Group D) and $2 million pays the top 10 in the agency that is almost nine times larger—one billing $553.1 million (Group E).

The difference in average revenues between the two groups is $495.8 million. The difference in the top 10 aggregate total cash pay between the two size groups is $932,000. Thus, for every million dollars of added billings, the pay of the top 10 goes up by only $1,880 per year in total ($932,000 divided by 495.8) or an average of $188 per executive.

Table 5 shows how each of the top 10 highest-paid executives fares in the various-size groups. There is a remarkable consistency in the data. The highest-paid executive receives between 18% and 22% of the total cash compensation of the top 10 in all five billing size groups. The 10th-highest-paid gets between 6% and 7.5% of the aggregate pay of the top 10. This consistency occurs in the base salary data, too.#

About this survey

Cole Surveys worked with Advertising Age to create this 1st Survey of Top Management Compensation. This is a cooperative venture designed to provide an accurate analysis of top management compensation while maintaining the confidentiality of participants.

A total of 92 agencies participated. Billings were used as the indicator of agency size. After examining the data, we divided the survey participants into five billing-size groups: Group A (up to $5 million), Group B ($5 million to $10 million), Group C ($10 million to $25 million), Group D ($25 million to $100 million) and Group E (more than $100 million).

The survey participants were further broken down into the four regions used by Advertising Age. The East includes 29 participants, or 31% of the total; the South has 21 participants, or 23%; the Midwest includes 30 participants, or 33%, and the West has 12, or 13%.

The largest agency in the survey reported billings of more than $3.5 billion. The smallest were two agencies which both reported billings of $1 million.

Total cash compensation was collected for the 10 highest paid in management and for the defined 19 key management positions.

Of the 1,654 executives reported in this year's study, 1,340 were slotted into one of the defined "benchmark" positions. The remaining 314 executives were considered by their agencies to have duties other than those described in the 19 key positions.

Each agency submitted the following data: Base salary as of Dec. 31, 1984, and Oct. 1, 1985. Incentive paid in 1985, usually for 1984 performance.

Individual employe information was submitted, identified by number. Employe identification numbers will be used to update our annual surveys.

All data received from participants were diagnosed. When necessary, agencies were called with questions. All data were carefully scrutinized before being entered into the database.

Each agency is assigned a code, which is included in the position arrays for ceo IIs and ceo Is. This confidential code, known only to each participant, is sent to each agency that submitted data. Using the code, agency management can see how the total cash compensation of its ceo compares to the compensation of similar agencies.

The results published here are excerpts from a much more comprehensive report prepared by Cole Surveys. Agencies that submitted data for this year's survey can receive the complete individualized survey results in a "Confidential Report" that displays its own data compared with two peer groups or clusters.

Agencies that did not participate in this survey but would like to obtain the full report may order an off-the-shelf version that contains the same information on all 19 benchmark positions (base salaries and total compensation). This report is available for $245.

An individualized "Confidential Report" or a nonindividualized "Position Report" is available by calling Cole Surveys at 1-800-343-2215.#

Sun-In spots go swimmingly

Shoots is a weekly report on recently produced commercials, listing the products, agencies and production houses.

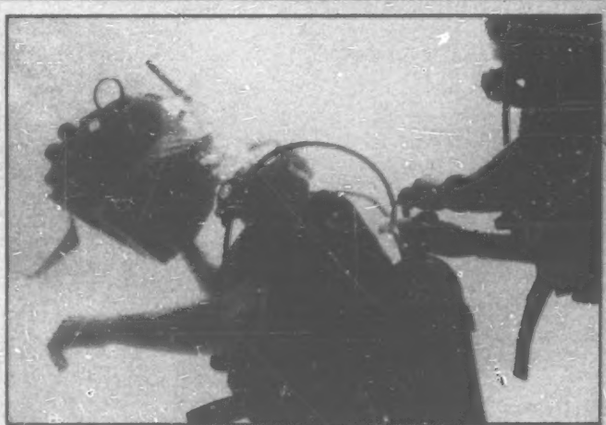
Sun-In hair lightener will be advertised in two new tv :30s by Chattem Inc., Chattanooga, breaking in late May on network tv via Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, New York. Both were shot in St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, by Bert Steinhauser Productions, New York. For one :30, Mr. Steinhauser hauled his equipment—a camera, a 20-lb. scuba tank and a 20-lb. weighted belt to keep him from rising—to the bottom of a 14-ft.-deep swimming pool for the underwater scenes. For the above-water scenes, the director (perched on a scaffolding he had built) filmed model Julie Shay standing on a cliff 20 ft. above the Caribbean. As she is about to dive, a voiceover man in the finished spot will say, "Every summer has its highlights. Moments that shine above the rest. Sun-In creates brilliant, memorable highlights for your hair." Ms. Shay then sprays the product into her hair. The actual dive was done by Donna Keegan (a diver/stuntwoman who did Kathleen Turner's stunts in "Romancing the Stone"). Mr. Steinhauser then mixed all the footage so viewers think the actress was diving and that the underwater scenes were shot in the Caribbean rather than a pool. The spot ends with a bottle of Sun-In resurfacing.

SHOOTS

In a second :30, Ms. Shay is seen reclining on her beach blanket. A man, unseen except for his feet, then kicks a soccer ball toward her and knocks over her Sun-In bottle. The sunbather likes the man and, as the spot ends, the two are seen—legs only—walking off together. In a piece of casting reminiscent of Hitchcock, Joe Shelesky, the agency's vp-associate creative director, cast his legs in the walk-off scene. Other agency creative credits: Jean Borofsky, art director; Michael Marx, copywriter, and Carrie Cook, producer. Other production credits: Carol Case, exec producer, and Alexis Caydam, hair stylist/makeup artist.

A new generic-image spot for Woodward & Lothrop, a Washington department store chain, uses pillars, columns and arches as backdrops for models and carries the theme "Woodies is my way." Saffer Cravit & Freedman Advertising, Toronto, produced the spot.

Woodward & Lothrop, the Washington department store chain known to its customers as "Woodies," has finished four :30s for spring/summer for swimwear, gold jewelry, an anniversary sale and generic image; all feature the theme "Woodies is my way." The generic image spot uses pillars, columns and archways as backdrops for the models. All were produced by Saffer Cravit & Freedman Advertising, Toronto.



Director Bert Steinhauser, Bert Steinhauser Productions, New York, turned scuba diver to shoot the underwater scenes of a new commercial for Sun-In hair lightener by Chattem Inc., Chattanooga, Tenn. Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, New York, handles.

Six Flags Atlantis, Hollywood, Fla., promotes "the world's largest water theme park" with a new tv :30, half of which features Warner Bros. animation of Bugs Bunny, Sylvester, Daffy Duck and other "Looney Tunes" members as they set out for the park in a big bus. Credits: Forsyth & Connors, agency, and G. Civins Productions.

AT&T has finished an internal communications film in which Tammy Grimes supplied the six-minute opening narration and James Earl Jones handled the 10½-minute closing narration at Howard Schwartz Recording's New York studio. Production credits at Creative Establishment, New York: Diana Da Davis, exec producer; Bruce Schulter, art director, and Fred Rossi, production coordinator. AT&T's creative team: Barbara Evans, division manager-program development, and Dave Thomas, exec producer.#

AGE&R Communications

Worldwide revenues for top 44 up 11.5%

By Jack J. Honomichl

The marketing/advertising/public opinion research industry had some good news and bad news in 1985, according to ADVERTISING AGE's 12th annual review of industry performance.

The bad news first. Total worldwide revenues of $1,652,500,000 for 44 leading companies were up 11.5% from 1984, and after adjustment for inflation (3.6%, according to the U.S. Department of Labor Consumer Price Index-U, monthly average), the real growth rate was 7.9% —off from 9.4% in 1984 and 8.1% in 1983.

The good news was that even so, research revenues grew far faster than the revenues of top U.S. ad agencies. The differential was greater than is shown on the accompanying table because the ad agency revenue growth has not been adjusted to account for acquisitions.

For the research companies affected by acquisition, growth rates are calculated on the year-long volume of both companies for 1984 and 1985. This superior performance regarding agencies is well known to some service company analysts in the financial world, and it helps explain why several agencies have acquired research companies.

Although research growth slowed—real growth was 7.9% in 1985, 9.4% in 1984—revenues increased faster than those of top U.S. advertising agencies.

This compilation is based on 44 U.S. research organizations and includes five additions not on last year's list—Lieberman Research West, Marketing Research Services, National Research Group, J.D. Power & Associates and Guideline Research. (Management Decision Systems, which appeared on last year's list, this year is merged with Information Resources Inc., No. 5.)

Twelve of the 44 top companies had 1985 revenue declines from 1984 or an increase that was less than the 3.6% inflation rate of 1985. Only one of these 12 was in the top 15.

While some of the dropoff is explained by a lack of political polling activity, which ran up revenues in 1984, and a decline in tv commercial testing, the rest seems to suggest that 1985 was a mixed bag, with the larger database operations showing the greatest strength and the smaller survey-oriented companies showing the most weakness.

This trend is evident in the supplemental information supplied by the Council of American Survey Research Organizations, which obtains year-to-year revenue data from some of its member companies on a confidential basis. For 1985, CASRO supplied revenue data on 56 companies, mostly smaller survey organizations, that were not included in the top 44 listing. These revenues totaled $132.8 million in 1985, up 10.9% from 1984.

Acquisitions were big news again in 1985, the most important being the purchase of Management Decision Systems (No. 30 on the 1984 listing) by Information Resources Inc. (No. 5 on the 1985 list). IMS International's U.S. subsidiary bought Luning Prak Associates, and Saatchi & Saatchi bought Clancy, Shulman & Associates and then merged it with what was Yankelovich, Skelly & White to form YSW/Clancy, Shulman (No. 15).

Mediamark Research purchased NABSCAN and Market Facts acquired the Tortorello Group. One of the biggest acquisitions this year was the Selling-Areas Marketing Inc.'s (No. 3) acquisition of Burke Marketing Services Inc. (No. 6). Together these organizations will form the second largest research organization in the world.

Seven of the top 44 in this listing had significant revenues from operations outside the U.S., which totaled $369.8 million, volume that did not grow appreciably in 1985. During most of the year, these overseas revenues were affected by the strong U.S. dollar.

The U.S.-only revenues of the top 44 were $1,282,700,000, up 13% from 1984 or 9.4% real growth after adjustment for inflation. Presumably, this relationship will shift in 1986 because of reevaluations of the dollar that started in late 1985.

Three of the top 44 companies listed this year—YSW/Clancy Shulman, NFO Research and Media Mark Research—with combined revenues of $63.5 million, are owned by British companies headquartered in London. This development is expected to continue because other British companies are shopping for acquisition and mergers in the U.S. now.

The top 44 listing identifies 73 people as either chairmen, presidents, partners or executives. They range in age from 34 (Robert Shulman, new president-chief executive officer of YSW/Clancy, Shulman) to 70 (Edward C. Bryant, chairman of WESTAT). The average age is 49.8. Generally, these top people have an advanced degree—the M.B.A. is most common—obtained at a major university in the Midwest. Of the 73 top executives, three are women: Judy Corson, a partner at Custom Research Inc.; Sharon Munger, president of the Marketing Services Group at M/A/R/C, and Catherine Paura, president of the National Research Group.

Following are profiles of 1985's top 44, including the news they made during the year and their plans for 1986.

Nation's top 44 research companies profiled

1 A.C. Nielsen Co., Northbrook, Ill. Founded in 1923 and since 1984 wholly owned by Dun & Bradstreet Corp. Revenues in 1985 were $517 million, up 7.7% from 1984.

These revenues have been adjusted to reflect the divestiture of Compucon, a separate organization with revenues of $11 million, which previously has been lumped by ACN into its Media Research Group. The growth has been calculated on a comparable base (excluding Compucon) from 1984 to 1985.

The Marketing Research Group, which has operations in 26 countries after adding Denmark and Taiwan in 1985, had revenues of $414 million in 1985, an increase of 6.7% from 1984. The Media Research Group had revenues of $103 million, an increase of 12%—in part because of the expansion of meter audience measurement service in Houston, Miami and Denver. About $268.8 million, or 52%, of

Henry Burk
A.C. Nielsen Co.

ACN's total revenues come from operations outside the U.S. The company does not release exact figures.

During 1985 in the U.S., the Marketing Research Group launched SCANTRACK US, which produces consumer purchase information on a weekly basis with data collection via UPC scanners in 1,600 supermarkets. The SCANTRACK service will offer local reports on 25 markets, and by the end of 1987, the plan is for 35 individual market reports.

To accompany SCANTRACK, the group now offers a delivery system called SCAN*FACT, which includes on-line access and downline loading to client computers.

Another new service, SCANTRACK PLUS, will provide market-specific data for evaluation of expenditures and the effectiveness of promotion offerings (such as coupons and tv advertising), as well as for tracking competitive activity and other factors influencing the market, such as weather and unemployment.

ACN's Media Research Group, which now has local-market meter panel service in 12 major markets, has announced it will expand its people meter test to 1,000 households nationally by this fall, and if validation tests are satisfactory, it will replace its national diary sample with the people meters.

Other new services in the making: A cable ratings system called Cable Audience Profile to provide a gauge for local ratings in relation to national ratings, both based on Nielsen Station Index diaries in the four sweep periods, and Monitor-Plus, which utilizes computerized pattern recognition to automatically identify tv commercials and report their start time and duration, a service now being tested in various markets, including New York, Chicago and Tampa.

As part of the merging of ACN-D&B activities, both the Marketing and Media Research groups now report to John C. Holt, exec vp in charge of D&B's marketing information services. ACN's research groups have 14,150 employes.

ACN chairman Henry Burk, 59, is also a member of the D&B board. Mr. Burk has a degree in economics from St. Gall Graduate School of Economics in Switzerland. Richard W. Vipond, 58, is president of Nielsen Marketing Research, and James D. Lyons, 51, is president of Nielsen Media Research.

2 IMS International, New York. Public corporation traded over the counter and founded in 1954. Research revenues in 1985 were $171.1 million, up 11.4% from 1984.

These revenues do not include those of Luning Prak Associates and L.P. Audits, acquisitions made in the U.S. in late 1985.

Top 44 (see accompanying article). These figures account for marketing/advertising research operations only. In fact, many of the companies listed have larger total revenues, as is explained in individual company profiles.

These percentages are not perfectly comparable to the top 44 research growth rates in that some of the agencies may reflect revenue growth in '85 attributable to acquisitions. In the top 44 research list, this has been corrected for by using the two (company plus acquisition) total revenues for both '84 and '85 to calculate growth rate. It was not possible to do this for the advertising agencies.

Nation's top 44 research companies

IMS has a battery of market research services and syndicated reports, most of which are related to the worldwide pharmaceutical industry.

Data series pertain, for instance, to ethical pharmaceuticals, over-the-counter pharmaceuticals, medical diagnoses and treatments, medical promotional efforts, hospital and laboratory supplies, animal health products and personal care products. Also, in the U.S. IMS has services related to the liquor industry.

Robert Louis-Dreyfus
IMS International

IMS has operations in 60 countries, although not all its services are offered in each of the countries. The company produces various reports on the pharmaceutical markets in an additional 23 countries. IMS has nearly 3,000 employes in its market research activities, with the Market Research Division accounting for 76% of total revenues.

The U.S. subsidiary, IMS America, Ambler, Pa., had 1985 revenues of $86.9 million, up 22.9% from 1984. Overseas revenues were up 2.1%. As with A.C. Nielsen Co., the other worldwide giant, overseas revenues suffered through most of the first part of 1985 because of the strong U.S. dollar.

During 1985 IMS introduced new additions to its on-line database services. The software package MICROLINK increases the efficiency with which clients can utilize its on-line services. IMBASE, a text retrieval system, also was introduced in 1985.

In December, IMS announced the intended acquisition (for $38 million in IMS stock) of Clark-O'Neill with the intent of developing in North America a fully integrated sales management information system combining profiling of physicians, sales demographics, call reporting and promotional services, with direct on-line access by all levels of pharmaceutical sales management and field force.

President-chief executive officer Robert Louis-Dreyfus, 39, who has an M.B.A. from Harvard University, has offices in New York and London. Andrew L. Clark, 60, is chairman. Serge Okun, 39, is president of the U.S. subsidiary; he is a graduate of the National School of Statistics and Economic Administration in Paris.

3 Selling Areas-Marketing Inc., New York. Wholly owned subsidiary of Time Inc. founded in 1966. Revenues in 1985 are estimated at $138.5 million, up 17% from 1984.

The big news at SAMI is the recent acquisition of Burke Marketing Services Inc., No. 6 in this listing, followed by the start of ScanAmerica, a joint venture with No. 4 Arbitron Ratings Co. ScanAmerica, technology for which has been in test in the Denver area of dominant influence, calls for a national panel of households, each equipped with people meters, that also captures purchase records of UPC-identified package goods via a wand that is part of the meter and computer apparatus.

SAMI's basic business is the amalgamation of warehouse withdrawal data on thousands of package goods sold through food stores. Reports are produced on 28-day cycles for each of 54 marketing areas. In 1985, SAMI launched a comparable report service based on drugstores. This service is producing reports in 11 markets. This will be expanded to 30 markets by mid-1986, and nationally projected data are expected to follow.

Also in 1985, SAMI introduced its SAMSCAN service

Carlyle Daniel

based on product movement data from samples of UPC scanner-equipped supermarkets. By the end of 1986, SAMI plans to have 15 major markets involved in this service. SAMSCAN reports are produced on 500 product categories on a weekly basis.

Also in 1985, SAMI purchased the rights to the Telecount System, which electronically records, via computer, the running of tv commercials. This is expected to be the basis for a service competing with A.C. Nielsen Co.'s proposed Monitor-Plus system.

SAMI has 344 fulltime, salaried employes in three offices.

President Carlyle C. Daniel, 55, is a graduate of Lynchburg College. He is also a Time Inc. vp.

4 Arbitron Ratings Co., New York. Founded in 1948 and since 1967 a wholly owned subsidiary of Control Data Corp. Revenues in 1985 were $122 million, up 15.3% from 1984.

Arbitron owns about 40% of Burke Marketing Services, No. 6 in this listing. Revenues from that association are not included in the above figures.

Arbitron produces radio, tv and cable audience studies at the local-market level using mail diaries or panels of meter-equipped households. Surveys in 214 tv markets, 11 of which are measured by a combination of meters and diaries, account for 52% of Arbitron revenues; 48% comes from measurement of 260 radio markets.

In 1986, Arbitron will expand radio audience measurements in 75 markets year-round by conducting four 12-week-long surveys each year. Also this year, Arbitron is using a redesigned radio diary that picks up am or pm on individual listings and a new report format will contain data on overnight listening, listening location and audience composition.

Arbitron reports are available to clients (radio and tv stations, advertisers and agencies) via printed reports; computer-based applications such as Arbitrends and Product Target AID, which deliver updated data from the company's mainframe to clients for custom tabulation and analysis, and an on-line database called Arbitron Information on Demand (AID).

During 1985, the Arbitrend II system was enhanced to provide more detailed information and flexibility, and a new report, Arbitrends Multi-Market Report, which allows clients to track the performance of any selected tv program across all metered markets, was introduced.

In 1986, Arbitron plans a new service called Client Audience Profile (CAP) Matrix, which will provide product usage indexes for tv program and time period audiences using age-sex indexes provided by Simmons, Scarborough and MRI, along with life-style cluster indexes from Donnelley/Simmons.

In early 1986, it was announced Burke Marketing Services, including Arbitron's share, was to be purchased by Selling-Areas Marketing Inc. (see No. 3) and the new SAMI-Burke organization and Arbitron jointly would fund development of ScanAmerica, a single-source research system that has been in development test in Denver. 5 Information Resources Inc., Chicago. Public company traded over the counter founded in 1977. Revenues in 1985 were $75.1 million, up 22.9% from 1984.

Revenues include the full absorption of Management Decision Systems (No. 31 in last year's listing), which IRI acquired in 1985; growth rate is based on combined revenues of both companies for 1985 and 1984. About 4% of revenues come from outside the U.S. Now in Japan, Australia, France and the U.K., IRI plans to expand into Canada and West Germany in 1986.

During 1985, the management personnel and services of IRI/MDS were merged, and new or modified services were developed.

The main service, BehaviorScan test markets, used for advertising and promotion testing and new product test marketing, increased the number of panelists in each of eight markets from 3,000 to 3,500. Two new BehaviorScan markets will open in 1986.

An expanded ASSESSOR simulated test marketing system was launched in 1985 to predict sales volume and market share of a new product at any point in the product development cycle (a merger of the MDS product ASSESSOR and the IRI service FASTRAC). IRI has recruited a separate UPC scanner panel of 20,000 households, whose purchase behavior is continuously monitored for ASSESSOR studies.

The Marketing Fact Book service, beyond the eight BehaviorScan markets, expanded data collection facilities by opening installations in neighborhood locations in six new cities during 1985, bringing the total number of IRI-monitored households to 40,000. In 1986, plans for additional urban neighborhood installations bring the total panel size up to 60,000.

In late 1985, IRI acquired Keystrokes Inc., a New Jersey company that monitors newspaper feature ads and consumer promotions, such as coupons and refund offers in about 130 markets.

The new service is called FeatureScan.

In 1986, IRI plans to introduce three services: pcEASY-TRAC, a micro software package for intelligent marketing workstations; pcEASYCAST for sales forecasting, and pcEXPRESS for user analysis of marketing, financial and forecasting data on the user's own personal computer.

IRI has 1,000 employes in seven U.S. branch offices.

Chairman John Malec, 41, is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin. President-chief executive officer Gian Fulgoni, 38, has a master's degree from Manchester University in England.

6 Burke Marketing Services Inc., Cincinnati. Founded in 1947 and since 1984 owned in part by Arbitron Ratings Co. (No. 4). Revenues in 1985 were $73.1 million, up 10.8% from 1984.

Jack Brown
BMSI

About 5% of BMSI revenues come from outside the U.S. through Burke Canada, a wholly owned subsidiary, and Burke International, a joint venture with the German research company Infratest, which owns 5% of BMSI. BMSI also owns 5% of Infratest. The sale of BMSI to Selling-Areas Marketing Inc. (No. 3), a subsidiary of Time Inc., took place May 6.

In the U.S., BMSI consists of five groups:

Burke Marketing Research specializes in custom survey research and tv copy testing (DAR and SELECTOR services) and —as of 1985—package testing using Burke's eye-movement research technology. Also, starting in 1986, Burke will market the advertising campaign evaluation service of Communicus, a Los Angeles-based company specializing in communications research.

The Burke Institute markets an extensive curriculum of courses related to marketing research.

The Test Marketing Group is revising its existing laboratory market system (AdTel) with the ViewScan system, a cable system based on household panels in test markets that pinpoints tv test copy on target households, meter measures audience viewing and collects product movement data at both the retail (UPC scanning) and household level (in-home scanning of UPC via wand).

ViewScan system expansion into additional markets is planned for 1986. Also in 1985, the Promotion Decisions unit of the Test Marketing Group introduced a series of new services —Coupon AccuRate, Coupon Trac, Coupon Custom Trac and PROPHET—all designed to assist clients to improve the efficiency of coupon promotions.

BASES, a leader in the predictive market modeling area (which saw its business grow 40% in 1985), opened client service offices in Chicago and San Ramon, Cal., in 1985 and introduced new services: SOVA (Source of Volume Analysis), PASS (Positioning Analysis and Segmentation Summary) and Concept Designer, the last of which combines a predictive concept testing system with a hybrid conjoint analytical approach to help refine concepts.

Burke Marketing Services, which specializes in tv copy testing and custom survey work, recently introduced STARTER (Syndicated Tracking of Awareness, Reported Trial and Estimated Repeat), a survey that automatically tracks new products being rolled into national distribution.

The main development at BMSI (pending the acquisition by SAMI) is ScanAmerica, a single-source tv audience-product movement service (currently being tested in the Denver area), which will be developed and marketed by SAMI-BMSI and Arbitron Ratings Co.

BMSI has a fulltime staff of 520 in 42 offices. Phone facilities consist of 200 WATS lines, 160 CRT-equipped.

Chairman Jack E. Brown, 42, attended the University of Cincinnati.

7 M/A/R/C Inc., Dallas. Public corporation traded over the counter founded in 1965. Research revenues for the fiscal year ended March 31 were $46.3 million, up 23% from the previous fiscal year. Unaudited total M/A/R/C revenues for the current fiscal year were $53.6 million.

In January, 1985, the company made a public offering of its stock. Also, in 1985, M/A/R/C opened a new 40-position, CRT-equipped central interviewing facility in McKeesport, Pa., and a comparable 56-station facility in Somerset, N.J.. This brings the total central facility telephone network up to 275 positions, CRT-equipped. M/A/R/C also opened new client service offices in Minneapolis and Los Angeles.

M/A/R/C

M/A/R/C's Local Market Network (local field services with CRT-equipped interviewing positions on-line to computers in Dallas) was expanded to 30 markets. The LMN on-line service provides toplines, quota control, monitoring and the capability to modify questionnaires or field instructions instantly in local-market personal or telephone interviewing situations.

M/A/R/C also established a census-balanced national mail panel to provide nationally projectable samples in addition to its Neighborhood Panel clusters around independent field services. Combined, the panels comprise more than 300,000 households.

In May, 1986, the company moved to a new six-story corporate headquarters building near Dallas-Fort Worth Airport.

As of April 1, M/A/R/C discontinued its Trendex buyership service, the company's only syndicated research product, which it acquired in 1983.

The same thing that makes America great makes your job difficult. Choice. And with choice comes change and innovation. Technology and changes in the way we live has brought about the proliferation of broadcast media options. Where once there was just radio, now there are radio formats, which target audiences and complicates your choices. Where once there was just television, now there are affiliated stations, independent stations, cable, DBS, VCR's, remote control and satellites, bringing scores of channels and hundreds of new choices. All of these changes and the escalating cost of media has made advertising decisions extremely complex. How do we know? We've been measuring broadcast audiences longer than anyone. Helping with the tough questions. Searching everyday for new answers. Arbitron. We know the territory.

MOR

About 80% of MOR's revenues are derived from research-related activities. The survey activitics are organized by division: consumer and industrial marketing research; media (especially newspaper) studies; social and public policy research, and political polling.

Because Robert N. Teeter, MOR's president, is prominent as a political pollster/consultant (Vice-President George Bush is a client), a considerable amount of MOR survey work is linked to elections, hence the revenue decline in 1985 from 1984. Nonpolitical work was up at MOR in 1985.

MOR has 80 fulltime employes, 55 of whom are salaried exempt, housed in five offices, one of which is in Toronto. A Washington office was opened in 1985. Three central phone survey facilities include 90 stations, 40 of them CRT-equipped.

Chairman-chief executive officer Frederick P. Currier, 62, received his M.A. from the University of Illinois. President Robert N. Teeter, 47, received his M.A. from Michigan State University.

GRC, with more than 50 fulltime, salaried employes in New York and Los Angeles, includes Guideline Research, Topline Research, Guideline-West and Tabline Tabulating Services. The latter two were started in 1985.

GRC specializes in custom market research—concept-product tests, tracking and trade studies, copy research, strategic and image (product and company) studies, trademark litigation, advertising claim substantiation studies, as well as the use of magnitude estimation for product development and optimization.

In 1986, GRC will introduce two new services: Extend-A-Line, a procedure for evaluating line extensions, and a new technique for conducting research in low incidence categories.

GRC is jointly headed by Norman Passman, 53, who has an M.B.A. from Long Island University, and Jay Friedland, 46, who has an M.S. from Purdue University.

O'Dell's luck, good sense lead to Market Facts

By Richard Edel

Every once in a while fate marks somebody to succeed where others fail. For some, it's almost a charmed life.

One such person is William F. O'Dell, the 77-year-old retired founder and former chairman of Chicago-based Market Facts. From this day almost 40 years ago when Market Facts opened its doors until he left market research in the mid-1960s, saying it is a young man's business, things have gone his way either because of good business sense, personal charm, luck or a combination of the three. His legacy is a company that ranks eighth among U.S. research companies, with 1985 sales of $37.8 million and net income of $1.1 million.

His hair is thinner now, but Mr. O'Dell still has a wry sense of humor and an energetic personality. Involved in business lecturing and writing for the past 20 years, he never dreamed Market Facts would go so far.

"It's just unbelievable that an embryonic idea can turn into such a huge corporation," he says. "And as they're so fond of pointing out around here, I'd have a hell of a time getting a job in the company now."

Given Market Facts' respected place today, it's hard to imagine that its future once dangled on a thread. The time was mid-May, 1946, and office space was virtually unavailable after the war. But Mr. O'Dell had found a 400-sq.-ft. sublet in Chicago's downtown business area, just a few stories up from where streetcars screeched around a corner.

Then all, Mr. O'Dell had just left as a Chicago-based vp for Ross Federal Research Corp., New York, taking three employes with him. The group had total assets of one typewriter, a name and the desire to own a business.

After striking a deal for the space with the building's assistant manager and paying the first month's rent, Mr. O'Dell stepped into the manager's office to pick up the keys. It was there he learned why most business people insist on dealing with the top.

"The manager told me we couldn't have the space because the assistant didn't have the authority to sublet," Mr. O'Dell says. "The two of them were having some kind of personal feud." And the fledgling Market Facts was caught in the middle.

Dejected, Mr. O'Dell trudged to Chicago's Union Station to catch a train to his suburban home. He slumped into a seat, thinking his money and that of five investors was gone.

"It was a sinking feeling. The announcements to prospective clients had been mailed, the telephone connected, our name on the door. We were ready to go."

But fate dealt Mr. O'Dell a trump card. By coincidence, the man sitting next to him on the train was Edward H. Baker Jr., whose law firm represented the estate of the building's owner, salt king J. Sterling Morton.

A stop at Mr. Baker's home and a phone call to his law partner in charge of the building fixed everything. Mr. Baker's partner told Mr. O'Dell to go home and get a good night's sleep. The sublet would be approved.

It was sheer luck, Mr. O'Dell says. "If on a chance basis, I hadn't sat next to that lawyer, Market Facts might never have been." Mr. Baker later became Market Facts' attorney for more than 20 years before his death.

It wasn't the last time that luck—and pluck—played a role in building Market Facts. Landing a big contract with his first client, the StranSteel division of National Steel, Detroit, Mr. O'Dell had to find out quickly whether farmers would buy its ubiquitous war-time product, Quonset huts, as outdoor storage. Borrowing money for field work and going without pay for two months, Mr. O'Dell and assistants were just getting survey forms ready when United Mine Workers chief John L. Lewis called a strike.

Power companies quickly ran out of coal, electric power failed and communications were disrupted. With no lights, Mr. O'Dell's two assistants moved their typewriters next to an outside window in his cramped office to keep up with their work.

The small staff sweated together in a building with no electricity to power fans or the elevator.

But the staff didn't give up even though the odds were heavily against a service business that specialized in custom market research in the 1940s. StranSteel's survey was ready on time and new business was beginning to roll in.

"I never thought of it as a high-risk business because it just had to succeed," Mr. O'Dell says. At least competition was not a factor. For example, A.C. Nielsen Co. was still a young enterprise then.

Once again, however, a lucky break and Mr. O'Dell's determination set the course of Market Facts. An early client, Bob Eggert, research director of the American Meat Institute, happened to change jobs, signing on with the Ford division of Ford Motor Co.

Mr. Eggert, who had worked extensively with Market Facts in the meat institute's successful battle to abolish price controls after the war, now was employed by Ford's whiz kids, who were beginning to use market research in their struggle to catch Chevrolet. Elmo Roper had been doing surveys for Ford until Mr. Eggert became marketing research director.

"Roper lost out because he was dealing with the wrong people," Mr. O'Dell says. Ford quickly became Market Facts' biggest client, accounting for up to 50% of its revenues and much of its growth well into the 1960s.

Despite having the account, the biggest problem in the early days was convincing executives at Ford, for example, that a sample survey could reflect the views of a larger population on such things as auto body styling, pricing and new products, Mr. O'Dell says.

"Ford's management had a hard time believing that you could interview a few thousand people and get a reliable picture of what millions of people would do. They were used to dealing with census data, which is not a sample survey, which made it extremely difficult to sell the idea that you could infer [things] from a small sample," Mr. O'Dell says.

"The fact is that we tried to work with prospective users because there were so few people who knew anything about marketing research."

In doing so, Market Facts developed a reputation for challenging clients' assumptions about the need for research, the optimum size of a project and the potential benefits to be derived from it. This led to Market Facts developing something of a devil's advocate style, which contrasted sharply with the nice-guy, midwestern image of growing Chicago advertising agencies, such as Leo Burnett Co.

Mr. O'Dell is fond of quoting Arthur Simon, formerly of Chicago-based Tatham-Laird & Kudner, who was looking into hiring a research company years ago. "I'll always remember his comment after he had talked to eight or 10 users of research: 'If you want an argument, call on Market Facts.'

"In other words, Market Facts would always challenge the nature of the study and the need for the research. I think we've built on that," Mr. O'Dell says.

It wasn't a situation where other companies were doing bad research, he says. "It was not so much bad as unnecessary, simply because people felt they needed data when they really didn't, or that it was too large a study for what was needed."

Market Facts' growth is a direct result of helping clients optimize allocation of their research dollars, Mr. O'Dell says. This is typified by its early creation of consumer mail panels, which provide accurate data at a cost one-third or less than that of personal interviews.

Today, Market Facts' Consumer Mail Panel is among the nation's largest with 250,000 households, compared with its forerunner, the National Panel with 1,000 households. But it took 10 years to gain acceptance, Mr. O'Dell says.

"It was really a matter of convincing research users that we were in the business to stay."

In addition to mail panels, Market Facts collected data and made reports on studies designed in-house or by clients. Today, however, clients have a wonderland of custom research services to choose from, including focus groups, shopping mall interviews, controlled store testing and telephone consumer opinion forums.

> "My advice to people getting into the industry today is to view market research from a management view. In other words, look at the need for the information and how it is to be used."

Michael Marcotte

Dave Hardin, the current chairman, started in 1950. Jack Abrams, former chief executive officer who still works parttime, and Verne Churchill, current ceo, started in the late 1950s. (One executive who did leave, Pete Peterson, later became U.S. Secretary of Commerce and was chairman of Lehman Bros. Kuhn & Loeb, New York, before its takeover by American Express.)

Mr. O'Dell also has rewarded hard work. Mr. Hardin, for example, received a chunk of stock one year as a Christmas bonus, Mr. O'Dell says.

"When he came in to thank me, I said, 'Dave, I've always remembered that time when I came into the office at 8:30 a.m. and you had been working all night long and were lying asleep on the davenport in my office.' His response was, 'What a profitable night that turned out to be.'"

Mr. O'Dell holds himself to his own high standards. He points to his waning enthusiasm for the business as the reason behind his decision to step aside as chairman in 1963.

"I was losing my contact with clients, and that's the fun part of the business. So that's when I gave thought to pulling out.

"Market research is a young man's business," meaning it takes stamina and the ability to stay the pace, he says.

So Mr. O'Dell became a lecturer at McIntire School of Commerce, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va., until 1975, and since has retired to Fort Myers, Fla.

He has written three books, including one for teen agers, called "How to Get Along with Parents," and has just completed a book called "Competitive Decision Making," which he hopes to publish later this year.

Mr. O'Dell spends much of his time these days just thinking and writing. He has come up with some advice for today's technology-hungry market researchers who he believes are losing sight of the role of the individual.

"Creativity is the one most important ingredient in decision making, bar none," Mr. O'Dell says. "My advice to people getting into the industry today is to view market research from a management view. In other words, look at the need for the information and how it is to be used. Let technology be the last thing you worry about.

"Understanding people is as important as the decision-making process itself."

BK's $200M strategy shift

Burger King Corp. shifts from limited-run "event marketing" to long-term positioning with a $200 million "This is a Burger King town. We know how burgers should be" campaign breaking June 1 via J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. (See story on Page 2.)

New advertiser co-op accents fall of 15%

By STEWART ALTER

The changing nature of agency-client relationships hit home last week in two dramatic ways.

- The Assn. of National Advertisers reported that for the first time in history, most clients no longer were using the 15% agency commission, until now the dominant form of agency compensation.
- Separately, but as if to sharpen the trend toward greater client involvement with media-budget management, reports surfaced that a new cooperative media-buying option was being offered to major advertisers.

The venture, to be owned by advertisers, reportedly calls for a pooling of budgets so that greater media-buying efficiencies could be extracted from agency-created media plans.

Money saved through this procedure would be returned to the co-op members.

Against this background, the ANA survey on agency compensation methods took on added meaning. The ANA revealed that only 43% of its 282 members still use the straight 15% commission, compared with 52% in 1983. In 1976, the first year the full survey was conducted, 68% of advertisers used the 15% method.

An additional 28% of the current respondents said they used some percentage other than 15% for compensation, and that was "usually less than 15%," according to William Weilbacher, president of Bismark Corp., New York, who presented the findings at the ANA Advertising Financial Management Conference this month.

"The trend appears to be toward bargain-making between advertisers and their agencies," said Mr. Weilbacher. He said that with the expansion of agency services beyond traditional advertising, clients are showing a greater interest in "defining more closely just what services are wanted and needed."

In exchange for these lower commission rates, some major advertisers lately have been more willing to take on the media-buying function, internally or through media-buying agents. A novel variation of this method reportedly is being offered by William

Marketers into syndie fare

By VERNE GAY

New York—In what could become one of the hottest media-buying trends in a decade, several major marketers are taking multi-million-dollar ownership positions in first-run syndicated programs.

Following its estimated $10 million agreement with Group W for the production of one-hour health specials and a 1987 sitcom (AA, May 19), Bristol-Myers is reportedly on the verge of closing similar deals with several other syndicators.

Procter & Gamble, by far the most aggressive advertiser following this path, has an agreement with the NBC-owned tv stations and LBS Communications to produce a first-run situation comedy tentatively titled "You Can't Take It With You." The show would air next year and would earn P&G close to a third of any profits.

General Foods Corp., which has made similar buys in the past, is reportedly seeking more syndication programing deals. So is General Motors Corp., which has produced the network "George Washington" miniseries and its sequel but has never been in first-run syndication.

In an unusual move, Campbell Soup Co. reportedly is trying to sell programing directly to tv stations without the shows carrying any of its advertising.

Johnson & Johnson and Clorox Co. are also reported to be seeking deals with syndicators, although

BBDO's French accent helped woo, win Apple

By CLEVELAND HORTON

Apple Computer severed one of its last ties with its entrepreneurial past—and with modern advertising history—when it lowered the boom on Chiat/Day last week and awarded its $50 million U.S. account to BBDO International.

For BBDO, the victory bore traces of a "Made in France" label. BBDO's presentation relied heavily on input from Phillipe Michel, president-creative director of the agency's sister office in Paris, CLM/BBDO, which handles the Apple account in France.

Mr. Michel assisted the new-business team by attending strategy sessions and critiquing the speculative creative work, according to Tom Clark, president of New York-based BBDO. Mr. Clark insisted, however, that none of the work presented included Mr. Michel's work and that he wasn't present during the pitch.

Mr. Michel is known to have close ties to Apple vp-product development Jean-Louis Gasse, formerly head of Apple France. Mr. Gasse, who was out of the country when Apple's agency decision was made, said he was "ambivalent" about the change. "I was very happy with BBDO in France," he said in a telephone interview from Tokyo, "but I'm sad we're severing our relationship with Chiat/Day."

Word of the decision, delivered late May 19 by Apple chairman John Sculley in a phone call to Chiat/Day chairman Jay Chiat, came as no surprise at the agency. "We were prepared for it," Mr. Chiat said. "And we were planning for it."

Chiat/Day ran page ads in the New York Times and San Jose Mercury News May 22 bidding farewell to its client of almost seven years. The ads used the familiar Apple ad typeface and thanked Apple for the relationship. "You've done for us what VW did for Doyle Dane Bernbach, what Hathaway did for Ogilvy & Mather, what McDonald's did for Needham, Harper & Steers," the ad read.

Since the megamerger of BBDO-Doyle Dane Bernbach-Needham Harper Worldwide was announced, BBDO has picked up Apple's $50 million U.S. account and Needham has added the $40 million Michelob brand from Anheuser-Busch. These have begun to offset the losses necessitated by conflicts, such as Needham's selling off its Los Angeles office into a separate $100 million agency to handle the American Honda account and BBDO's resignation—forced by A-B, a major Needham client—of its $80 million in Stroh Brewery Co. media billings, much of that an agency-of-record buying assignment

Buyout rumors buzz along Madison Avenue

New York—The Interpublic Group of Cos. denied reports circulating last week that it is exploring separate acquisitions of N W Ayer here and Tatham-Laird & Kudner in Chicago. "I'm not talking to either one of them," said chairman-ceo Philip Geier Jr. TLK also has been reported to be in discussions with Saatchi & Saatchi Co., though chairman-ceo Charlotte Beers, while acknowledging past talks with Saatchi, said there are no ongoing or active conversations and that the agency is not interested in a merger. Separately, HBM/Creamer vice-chairman Harold Strauss denied widespread reports that his $380 million agency was involved in serious negotiations to be sold, possibly to an overseas agency.

Toronto—They didn't put it on the program, but they might as well have.

The recent spate of agency combinations dominated the World Federation of Advertisers' 34th General Assembly here last week.

"The client chapter has yet to come."

Y&R on P&G hit list? 3
Procter & Gamble has shifted brand management responsibilities in its recently acquired Richardson-Vicks unit in order to combine operations of the two companies by product categories. Industry sources say the brand realignment is the first step toward a rearrangement of R-V's agency roster, with Young & Rubicam considered vulnerable because of its earlier resignation as a P&G shop and its subsequent appointment by P&G rival Colgate-Palmolive Co.

Eurocom seeking U.S. deal 3
Eurocom, Europe's largest agency network, last week set the stage for selling one of its major arms to a U.S. agency. The network purchased an additional stake in the Belier agency group, increasing its share to 95% from 45%, to make the French operation attractive to U.S. investors. One of the prime suitors for a piece of Belier is BBDO.

Michelob campaign breaks 6
Needham Harper Worldwide last week broke a new campaign for Anheuser-Busch's superpremium Michelob brand only days after winning a seven-month battle for the $40 million account. Needham now handles all three of A-B's superpremium beers—Michelob, Michelob Classic Dark and Michelob Light.

Nielsen back to diaries 12
A.C. Nielsen Co. last week succumbed to pressure from the Big 3 tv networks and agreed to postpone the introduction of its people meter until 1987.

IAA meet begins today 29
The International Advertising Assn. opens its 30th World Congress in Chicago today. More than 1,000 advertising and marketing executives from around the world are participating in the weeklong meeting.

FEATURES

Lucie's show 44
What can a spunky, fast-talking ex-secretary from Cleveland bring to Hollywood that Hollywood hasn't already seen? Plenty, say those who know Lucie Salhany, domestic tv/video programing president at Paramount Pictures. "She rolls up her sleeves and gets in there. And she leaves her mark," says a former colleague. "She won't shrink from the challenge."

Half-century for the Gate 46
The Golden Gate Bridge's 50th anniversary celebration, billed as the West's answer to the Statue of Liberty gala, is a year away, but the fireworks have already begun.

BK ads aim for homey flavor

By BRIAN MORAN

Burger King Corp. June 1 breaks a long-promised $200 million campaign using a new theme song and realistic visuals to cast BK as a down-home source of old-fashion American pride.

The campaign, themed "This is a Burger King town. We know how burgers should be," also dumps Miami-based BK's 4-year-old "Aren't you hungry?" handle, the rallying cry for the No. 2 hamburger chain's previous "Battle of the burgers" assaults against leader McDonald's Corp. and No. 3 Wendy's International.

In place of those needling messages, BK and its agency, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, have crafted a campaign that stresses

ADWATCH

Recall of Burger King ads still seen dropping

By JULIE FRANZ

Advertising for Burger King's Chicken Tenders and its breakfast menu have done nothing to bolster the fast-food chain's advertising awareness, which has been slumping in the wake of its much-heralded, often-criticized "Find Herb" campaign.

In the April adWatch survey, BK's share of first mentions in the fast-food category dropped 2.4 percentage points, returning BK close to the share of first mentions it had before breaking the "Herb" campaign in late November.

While only changes of 2.8 percentage points or more are considered statistically significant, the larger picture is significant. BK's adWatch scores from November through April (Herb through Chicken Tenders) form a bell curve that would make any college statistics professor proud.

BK's share of advertising first mentions was 10.1% in November before the Herb campaign began, rose to a high of 23% in February and dropped to 12.9% in April, the month after the campaign was completed. The burger-maker's average score for the six-month period was 15.7%.

McDonald's share of top-of-mind awareness among fast-food advertisers remained relatively stable from November through April, averaging 44% of first mentions during that period. That feat can be attributed in part to sheer weight, with McDonald's spending an average $5 million per week on tv advertising at the height of its McD.L.T. introduction.

Rounding out the fast-food category are Wendy's at No. 3 with 7.1% of first mentions; Hardee's with 2.6%, and Pizza Hut with 1.3%. Just over 16% of those asked to name the first fast-food advertising to come to mind answered "none" or "don't know."

AdWatch is a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In April, 1,000 adults were questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

Two normally volatile categories, beer and soft drinks, have been quiet lately.

Beer sales have been stagnant, new-product introductions have dropped off and no new national advertising campaigns have broken in the category. Top-of-mind awareness for major beer brands' advertising has held steady.

That may not last much longer, since brewers have been busy juggling their agency lineups. Recent account shifts for Anheuser-Busch's Michelob and G. Heileman Brewing's Old Style may signal significant movement in top-of-mind beer advertising awareness later this year as new campaigns for those and competing brands begin to appear.

Advertising for A-B's Budweiser remains No. 1 in first mentions among beer markers, with 13.2%. Behind the leader are Coors with

Needham works night shift for Michelob

Agency has all A-B superpremiums

By SCOTT HUME and JULIE FRANZ

Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, last week broke a new campaign for Anheuser-Busch's superpremium Michelob brand only days after winning a seven-month battle for the $40 million account.

The new Michelob theme—"The night belongs to Michelob"—bears more than a passing resemblance to the tag line of a new tv spot that also started last week for Miller Brewing Co.'s competing Lowenbrau brand.

Both superpremiums are in need of a sales rebound, and Needham is likely to have a tough job reviving Michelob. Michelob sales last year totaled 6 million bbls., down more than 20% from the brand's peak in 1981, said Manny Goldman, an analyst at Montgomery Securities, San Francisco.

Needham now handles all three of A-B's superpremium beers—Michelob, Michelob Classic Dark and Michelob Light.

The new effort for Michelob began May 23 with a 60-second commercial that aired during NBC's "Friday Night Videos"; a 30-second version aired during NBC's "Saturday Night Live" May 24.

The 60-second spot is set to rocker Phil Collins' "In the Air Tonight," a tune made popular by its use on NBC's "Miami Vice." A-B last year signed Mr. Collins for use on Michelob (AA, May 27, '85).

St. Louis-based A-B was looking for a Michelob theme with longevity that would spark a variety of executions, said Joel Hochberg, Needham exec vp-director of creative services.

Mid-June will bring "an explosion" of media, including additional tv spots as well as radio, print and outdoor, said Don Richards, senior vp-management representative at Needham.

The campaign positions Michelob as a beer that drinkers should "trade up to" on weekends and special occasions, he explained.

Needham's first creative for Michelob is "designed to reinforce Michelob's quality heritage and positioning as America's leading superpremium beer," said A-B exec vp Michael Roarty.

Miller Brewing's new Lowenbrau commercial, from J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, also adopts a nighttime theme. The tag, an extension of its "This world calls for Lowenbrau" theme, is "This night calls for Lowenbrau."

Lowenbrau's "night" spot uses the concept of night without changing the campaign's international "world" theme. It is aimed at the drinking-age-to-25-year-old beer drinker with its variation on the music-video format.

The commercial shows young people in the U.S., Munich, London and Tokyo out at night.

Neither Needham nor JWT is worried that the similar themes will cause confusion. While Needham's Michelob campaign is based entirely on the night theme, JWT has just produced one "night" spot and has not changed the theme of the entire campaign, said Rita Winters, JWT creative director-copywriter on Lowenbrau.

A total campaign themed "The night belongs to Lowenbrau," set to rock music, was canned in favor of the current international campaign, Ms. Winters said.

In moving Michelob—a brand with a lucrative "inheritance" but dim sales prospects—to Needham, A-B united responsibility for all Michelob entries at one agency.

Two years ago, Michelob and Michelob Classic Dark were sent off to Ted Bates Advertising/New York, and the $25 million Michelob Light account arrived at Needham (AA, July 16, '84). All three previously had been at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis.

The Michelob shift completed the reunion begun earlier this year when the $5 million Classic Dark account was moved from Bates to Needham (AA, Feb. 6).

Needham already handled the $50 million Bud Light account and the $25 million Busch account. With total A-B assignments now amounting to nearly $150 million, the brewer is the largest client of the newly merged agency of DDB Needham, one of three agency units under the BBDO-Doyle Dane Bernbach-Needham holding company (AA, April 28, et seq.).

BBDO has resigned $100 million in business from Stroh Brewery Co., Detroit. Stroh has invited five New York agencies to pitch for its $20 million Old Milwaukee account and $80 million in Stroh media buying. The five are N W Ayer; Grey Advertising; Jordan, Case, Taylor & McGrath; Lowe Marschalk, and McCann-Erickson.

Marschalk already handles Stroh's and Stroh Light brands.

A Stroh exec said media buying may be taken in-house.

A-B "exercised its market power to force BBDO to resign the Old Milwaukee account," Stroh president Roger Fridholm said last week. "We had been pleased with BBDO's work and were distressed to be deprived by a competitor of a key resource."

With all three Michelob brands again at one shop, A-B is expected to involve the regular and light brands in more joint promotion and advertising.

A-B tested that strategy last

- In the chart that compared the revenues and growth rate of the top 44 U.S. research companies with those of the top U.S. ad agencies (AA, May 19, Page S-4), the figures for the top research companies were inadvertently left out. The 1985 worldwide revenues of the top 44 research companies were $1,652,500,000, compared with 1985 ad agency revenues of $6,510,800,000. The 1985 U.S. revenues of the research companies of $1,282,700,000 compared with 1985 revenues of U.S. ad agencies of $4,378,400,400. The worldwide growth rate of the ad agencies from 1984 to '85 was 10.9%, compared with an 11.5% growth rate of research companies; the U.S. growth rate of the ad agencies was 8.7%, compared with a 13% growth rate of research companies.
- Avrett, Free & Ginsberg, New York, is the agency for Carter-Wallace's new Nair Mousse Hair Remover, not Ted Bates Advertising (AA, May 19, P. 8).

POLITICAL OUTLOOK/RISK
Elections here are due by the end of 1987. Australia's economic performance will be the focus of that election. The Hawke government currently could find re-election difficult, though opposition is in disarray.
ECONOMIC FORECAST
Economy headed for showdown over next two years. An expected weak currency and a volatile interest rate won't help.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
The Labour administration of Prime Minister Robert Hawke is widely perceived as pro-business. All major political parties support the free market.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Official attitude very favorable. But in advertising, there is a strong nationalist movement that still supports restrictions on commercials filmed outside Australia.

TELEVISION SETS (millions) 23.0

POLITICAL OUTLOOK/RISK
Appears set for a period of democratic stability over the medium term. Major elections in November and the drafting of a new constitution mean constant political activity but pose no serious risk to business or the economy.
ECONOMIC FORECAST
The anti-inflation package just decreed seems likely to prepare Brazil for sustained growth to the end of the decade. Rising wages will keep the domestic consumer market growing steadily, while the outlook for exports also is bright.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
Recent reform has left virtually all retail prices frozen indefinitely. Over-all, the free market thrives alongside an enormous public sector.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Criticism of multinationals and reserved markets in several sectors are features of the new republic, but foreign investment, in general, is actively encouraged. The government still favors locally-owned ad agencies with accounts, however.

Real growth in GDP may outpace the U.S. this year, but western provinces will suffer from the fall in oil prices, with a downturn likely in 1988.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
High levels of concentration in a small market make Canadian companies slower to respond to consumer preferences. This is changing as the market is exposed to greater international competition.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Positive, but wary of the influence exerted by U.S. media and entertainment conglomerates over Canadian culture. Strong nationalist sentiment may be growing stronger. In publishing, there are numerous restrictions on foreign ownership.

POLITICAL OUTLOOK/RISK
Socialists defeated in March elections. Center-right coalition government of Francois Mitterrand and Jacques Chirac is potentially unstable. Mr. Mitterrand's term ends in 1988, but he may step down earlier.
ECONOMIC FORECAST
Recent devaluation of the franc may see some improved GDP growth. Small rises in investment and consumption, coupled with lower inflation rates, may contribute to modest recovery.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
Increasingly receptive. Some central control has been lifted, some layoffs are permitted and some wages have been deindexed. Commercial tv and radio are expanding under some pressure from pan-European commercial stations. Pent-up demand for ad time is enormous.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Foreign investment is actively promoted and welcomed, though closely scrutinized. Access to credit has been eased and some exchange control lifted.

POLITICAL OUTLOOK/RISK
Liberal Democratic party will stay dominant, insuring a pro-business climate. Next LDP prime minister might be less forceful than predecessors in opening up domestic markets, although that scenario is still unclear.
ECONOMIC FORECAST
Japan's economy may cool in 1987. A strong yen and stagnant demand will slow exports. Domestic demand is unlikely to take up the slack in the short term. However, Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone is preparing proposals designed to increase internal consumption of goods dramatically as well as increase government spending on the country's infrastructure.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
Generally favorable, but favors strong central government influence in economy and close government-business links. Some government monopolies being sold to private investors.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Free in principle, but the government is frequently inclined to assist local companies. As more local companies seek ventures with foreign ones, it has become increasingly difficult for Japanese authorities to exercise control. U.S. cigaret marketers are the first to benefit from moves to open up previously closed Japanese markets, and others may follow. Government also is under severe pressure to reduce the growing trade surplus.

POLITICAL OUTLOOK/RISK
Stable, but the center-right coalition of Chancellor Helmut Kohl is under some pressure from competing political parties. This opposition is focusing on employment and labor issues.
ECONOMIC FORECAST
Strong recovery over the medium term. Low interest rates, oil prices, production costs and little inflation fuel recovery. Trade surplus is at record levels.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
All major political parties support the free market. There is widespread support for antitrust, antimonopoly legislation. Government support for social welfare, but minimal state intervention in economy.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Very favorable. There are no controls on foreign investment or on foreign exchange.

ATTITUDE TOWARD FREE MARKET
Free market generally accepted by major political parties, but the role of the president in economic matters remains strong.
ATTITUDE TOWARD FOREIGN INVESTMENT
Increasingly favorable, partly due to need for foreign capital and technology. But foreign ownership of advertising agencies remains severely restricted, and the subject of broad debate.

New Hampshire toasts out-of-state liquor sales

By Lee Horwich

One state stands out in New England liquor consumption statistics. New Hampshire residents consume almost twice as much liquor as their neighbors, according to the Distilled Spirits Institute, Washington. But Bob Herlihy knows statistics don't always tell the whole story.

As director of marketing merchandise and stores for the New Hampshire State Liquor Commission, Concord, Mr. Herlihy realizes New Hampshire's high ranking reflects the success he has in selling the state's alcohol to the rest of New England. Although aggressive pricing on major brands and an increased ad budget have been key to the state's success, one factor remains pivotal: New Hampshire has no sales tax.

"We figure between 55% and 58% of all sales are to out-of-state customers," Mr. Herlihy says. Massachusetts alone accounts for one-third of New Hampshire's sales, he adds.

Since prohibition ended in 1933, New Hampshire has owned and operated all liquor stores in the state. While beer and wine can be sold in grocery stores, hard liquor can be sold only by the state.

Three governor-appointed liquor commissioners control the state's 72 stores. Vermont and Maine also have state-run liquor operations, but New Hampshire has better prices.

For example, a 1.75-liter bottle of Smirnoff brand vodka costs New Hampshire customers $2.25 less than in Vermont and $3 less than in Maine, according to a study by the National Alcohol Beverage Control Assn., Washington.

New Hampshire stores have about an 8% to 10% price advantage over privately run stores in Massachusetts, Mr. Herlihy says.

Neither Vermont nor Maine does any advertising for their stores; all liquor ads that appear in those two states are placed by the distillers.

State law prevents the Montpelier-based Vermont State Liquor Board from advertising, says Sandra Campbell, merchandising director of the board. "The law says we should not promote intemperance."

In Maine, the legislature doesn't appropriate any money for advertising, says Guy Marcotte, director of the state bureau of alcoholic beverages. "New Hampshire has a different philosophy than we do. They are high volume, low margin," he says. "We are just the opposite."

In fiscal 1985, Maine's total liquor sales were $68.5 million, Mr. Marcotte says. And in the same period, Vermont stores had total sales of $37.6 million, Ms. Campbell says.

Total liquor sales for New Hampshire were $154 million in 1985, a slight decrease from the previous year, Mr. Herlihy says.

Even with economic factors in its favor, New Hampshire still maintains an aggressive marketing stance. Until 1983, liquor advertising was handled by the state. But at that time, the account went to Holmes-Lewis, Manchester, N.H., a local agency.

The agency avoids typical liquor store advertising, which generally crams the maximum number of prices into the minimum amount of space, says Chris Herbert, account exec for Holmes-Lewis.

"Our ads are cleaner than that," he says. Many of the ads are linked to holidays, typically the busiest time for liquor stores, Mr. Herbert says. Heaviest sales volumes occur during the Christmas season, Memorial Day and Labor Day.

A recent St. Patrick's Day promotion was only marginally successful, Mr. Herbert says. An ad promoting several Irish-themed products yielded mediocre results, he says.

In 1985, liquor sales leveled off and the New Hampshire government decided to pay more attention, financially, to marketing and advertising. Subsequently, in fiscal 1986, which ends June 30, the state allocated a $255,000 ad budget, more than double the previous year's budget, Mr. Herlihy says. And that figure will increase more than 50% in fiscal 1987, he says.

However, according to state law, 80% of all money must be spent on out-of-state advertising, Mr. Herlihy says. Of that 80%, more than half will be spent on targeting the Boston market.

The New Hampshire State Liquor Commission also is broadening its marketing efforts to reach potential customers in western Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island, he says.

Equal money is spent on radio and newspapers. Other types of promotions for specific brands are nixed because political realities intrude.

"I am limited in certain things because the state owns the stores," Mr. Herbert says. "I would do more giveaways and co-op advertising," he says, "but the politics of giving business to one certain distributor over another would be too risky."

Instead, advertising is directed at tourists who come to New Hampshire for anything from skiing to fall foliage watching. A clear advantage is the location of many of the state's outlets, Mr. Herbert says.

Of New Hampshire's 72 stores, 25 are located along the interstate highways, with their own entrances and exits, making it convenient for tourists to stop on their way home.

Geography also is a plus for New Hampshire liquor sales. To get to Maine from Massachusetts, people pass through New Hampshire. The Portsmouth Liquor Store, which is along the route to Maine, accounts for $15 million in annual sales, or about 8.5% of the state's business, Mr. Herlihy says.

These built-in advantages assist the New Hampshire State Liquor Commission in its effort to garner the lion's share of the region's liquor business. And Mr. Herlihy has no intentions of leveling off the state's efforts to attract new customers.

"We are going to concentrate on the female market," he says, although no plans have been made. "In surveys we've done, we found they have greater control of discretionary spending. Also, women don't browse that much, they are more efficient shoppers."

So for as long as Mr. Herlihy is in charge of promoting the state liquor business, New Hampshire will continue to try to be the bartender for New England's bargain hunters.

Ever heard of an ad agency that wanted to be judged on how much it returns on your investment?

Even some of the best agencies expect to be evaluated not on sales, but on the imprecise measurements of campaign awareness, salespoint playback or awards. But, in times of cost-accounting and cost-cutting, more top-management people want to see – not just sense – the results of ad expenditures. Which is where The DR Group comes in. We are one of the most complete and competent direct response agencies in the business. We put the proof of our abilities right on your bottom line. There's no place to hide in our business. The profits come in or the agency goes out. And it's all there in crisp, cold dollars and cents.

The DR Group insists on it.

If you're using direct marketing now, it's ten to one you've got a do-it-yourself or free-lancing agency operation: copy here, art there, lists, mailing, and evaluating somewhere else. We do it all for less. And we'll prove that, too.

If you're not yet in direct response advertising, you may be missing some very happy returns on your advertising investment.

Either way, if you've got a phone, we have one, too. Why not call Jim Schaefer (President) in New York or George Zahka (Chairman) in Boston.

11.4%, Miller High Life with 9.1%, Miller Lite with 6.6% and Bud Light with 6.2%.

Despite multi-million-dollar ad spending and new campaigns in the soft-drink category, that segment, too, has seen little change in the past three months.

Pepsi had been losing ad awareness share to Coke during the last half of 1985.

But new ads featuring actors Michael J. Fox and Don Johnson and singer Glenn Frey boosted Pepsi's score 9.4 percentage points to 32.9% in February, allowing it to surpass Coke as the soft-drink category leader in advertising first mentions.

Last month, Pepsi's share dipped 2.6 percentage points to 30.8% of first mentions, not enough to be statistically significant, but just enough to edge it out as the advertising recall leader in the soft-drink category.

Coke gained 2.1 percentage points of ad recall in April to 33.8%, again not enough to be significant, but enough for the brand to regain the lead in soft-drink advertising first mentions.

No. 3 in ad recall in the soft drink category in April was 7-Up with 3.9%. Diet Coke followed with 2.9% and Diet Pepsi was fifth with 2.0%

The 10 best-recalled (unaided) ads in April were for, in descending order, Coca-Cola, McDonald's, Pepsi, Miller/Miller Lite, Budweiser/Bud Light, Burger King, Ford, Pampers, Tide and Chevrolet.

More than 56% of those queried answered "none" or "don't know" when asked to name the first ad they recalled having seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In other news from the April adWatch survey:

- Johnson & Johnson's tamper-resistant replacement for Tylenol capsules—Tylenol caplets—made their first showing in last month's adWatch survey. Consumers named Tylenol caplets first 2.8% of the time.

Over-all, brand name Tylenol remained the leader in top-of-mind awareness among medicine & drugs with 37% of first mentions, up slightly over March. Bayer garnered 5.5% of first mentions; Advil, 5.4%; Anacin, 3.4% and Contac, 1.7%.

- Kodak gained 2.9 percentage points in the camera category in April, nabbing 22.6% of advertising first mentions on the strength of its VR-35 campaign, which broke March 24. Rival Polaroid on April 2 broke 100 days of heavy multimedia promotion for its new Spectra instant photography system, but that effort brought 8% of first mentions, an addition of only 1.9 percentage points from March, not enough to be considered statistically significant.

In the No. 2 slot was Canon, with 12.5% of first mentions.

- In February, adWatch added a credit card category to its survey of advertising top-of-mind awareness. After three months on the survey, advertising for VISA leads the category in first mentions with 30.4%, MasterCard has 20%; American Express, 13.6%; Sear's Discover Card, 2.7%, and Americard, 1.6%.

- In the wine category, Riunite gained 3.9 percentage points to boost its score to 14.5% of first mentions, its highest share of first mentions. Gallo, on the other hand, lost 2.8 percentage points to drop its score to 7.5% of first mentions, its lowest score since last December. Advertising for Gallo's Bartles & Jaymes wine coolers remains in third place with 4.2% of first mentions. California Cooler popped into the top five for the first time since September with 1.8% of first mentions.#

The American Assn. of Advertising Agencies wants donations of prime time tv and drive time radio for its campaign against drug use. Will you make such time available and do you expect conflicts with other demands for public service time?

George Schweitzer, vp-communications, CBS Broadcast Group, New York: Last year, CBS donated $200 million worth of free time for hundreds of public service announcements. Many were related to drug and alcohol use, so we support the Four A's effort. Of course we can't use this campaign exclusively but we'll devote an appropriate amount of time for it. The only problem is they have a :30 spot and we only use :10s in prime time. We said, "Make some :10s and we'll use them," and we'll use the :30 in other dayparts.

G. SCHWEITZER

A. MAKUPSON

Amyre Makupson, public affairs manager, WKBD-TV, Southfield, Mich.: WKBD runs a minimum of 120 psas a week, and we're currently highly committed to anti-substance-abuse messages, including anti-alcohol. We get tons of requests for psa time, and we screen those to determine which are the most beneficial and which ones our general viewership will respond to. We give some prime time on a limited basis. If we can accommodate (the Four A's) we will, but nothing gets on without getting screened first.

James Duffy, vp, Capital Cities/ABC, New York, and president-communications in the network & broadcast division: Capital Cities/ABC will do all it can to cooperate with the Four A's. At the same time, you are well aware that we have made a major commitment to mount a major campaign with the Public Broadcasting Service to combat adult illiteracy. . . . As we meet our needs for (Project Literacy U.S.), we will determine how best to accommodate requests such as the one the Four A's is making

Raymond Timothy, group exec vp, NBC-TV, New York: Drug abuse is a nationwide problem that needs addressing. NBC has met with a Four A's representative several times regarding their anti-drug campaign. We applaud their effort and look forward to working with them. We're now in discussion with the Four A's to see how we can work together to ensure the success of the campaign.

Wayne Vriesman, vp-general manager, WGN (am), Chicago: We could not add two minutes to our current prime time schedule. We all have our levels (of public service time), and in no way does that diminish our attempt to take on the problem. But we have to fit it in with demand for time from other well meaning organizations with campaigns in other areas of public concern. (As an all-talk station), we can talk to someone on a given subject and do more than a minute-structured spot can do. That's often more effective.

P&G, Colgate strike back

S&S/Bates deal triggers loss

By STEWART ALTER and NANCY GIGES

NEW YORK—The two clients that were central to conflict speculation arising from last month's $450 million Saatchi & Saatchi buyout of Ted Bates Worldwide apparently have voted against the deal.

Colgate-Palmolive, as expected (AA, May 12), has made its move, shifting $100 million in billings from the Bates side of the Saatchi network and splitting it between Young & Rubicam and Foote, Cone & Belding.

This departure—due to the superior weight of Saatchi's Procter & Gamble business—came as no surprise. But industry sources have told ADVERTISING AGE that P&G is preparing to take away a portion of its $173 million in billings at Saatchi.

It is not known whether Saatchi's DFS Dorland Worldwide, another shop that caused P&G to swallow hard when it was put together, will lose business.

Nonmerged agencies on P&G's roster are expected to benefit, with Leo Burnett Co. to be the biggest gainer. Burnett is scheduled to meet with P&G officials June 2.

A P&G executive told ADVERTISING AGE, "I wouldn't be surprised at some changes."

If the reports prove accurate, it could be the first time both clients entangled in a major account conflict moved business out of their agencies. The Colgate and P&G measures could be interpreted as a dramatic escalation of client unhappiness with megamerged agencies, although a P&G official went out of his way to deny that.

Around Cincinnati, the word is that P&G does not want the pending account shifts to look like a "public spanking." According to one P&G executive, "We've got to work with the agencies." P&G's thinking is said to follow this line: "To humiliate Saatchi would be dangerous and disruptive. They've got to continue to write ads. And taking away a big piece of the business would just make them mad at you. That would be dumb and we don't do dumb things."

Yet, other sources said a "slap on the wrist" is precisely what P&G wants to deliver. They verified reports that Robert Goldstein, vp-advertising, has made no secret of his anger in recent weeks. "Goldstein

Ayer snares $30M in Citicorp business

NEW YORK—Citicorp has assigned its first national consumer advertising account, estimated at $30 million, to N W Ayer. The decision follows a seven-month review that also included BBDO, Doyle Dane Bernbach, Lowe Marschalk and SSC&B:Lintas. Separately, Citicorp's Citibank subsidiary has dropped incumbent SSC&B:Lintas USA from the review for its $9 million northeastern consumer advertising account.

NEW YORK—Lowe Marschalk reportedly has resigned its $5 million Upjohn account—including Cortaid, Kaopectate and new products—in anticipation of new business. An Upjohn spokesman denied an agency review is under way and said the Kalamazoo, Mich.-based company had not been formally notified of a resignation. Marschalk had no comment.

New co-op to buy media

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—A newly formed media-buying cooperative does not yet have a name or an office or even an official client roster, but it already may be bad news for ad agencies.

The unique cooperative was announced last week by Ralston Purina Co. ad executive William Claggett and media/marketing consultant Herb Zeltner.

The co-op is expected to open with as much as $450 million in media billings, and it could be much more (AA, May 26).

Clients will have an ownership position in the co-op. Although no major advertisers have signed on yet, discussions are under way with a "major brewery and a major automotive company," Mr. Zeltner said.

According to sources, executives from Adolph Coors Co., Golden, Colo.; Ford Motor Co., Dearborn, Mich.; RJR Nabisco, Winston-Salem, N.C., and Ralston Purina, St. Louis, participated in the development stage of the co-op's business plan. But it was not known whether any of those companies would become actual members of the co-op. Mr. Zeltner would not confirm or deny that executives from these companies had been working with his new company.

If those advertisers were to take a position in the co-op and give it all their media buying, the operation would be handling more than $1.5 billion in billings. The entire independent media-buying-services industry currently handles about $2 billion in spending.

In theory, the co-op's immense buying power would give it an advantageous bargaining position and would reap savings for its client-partners.

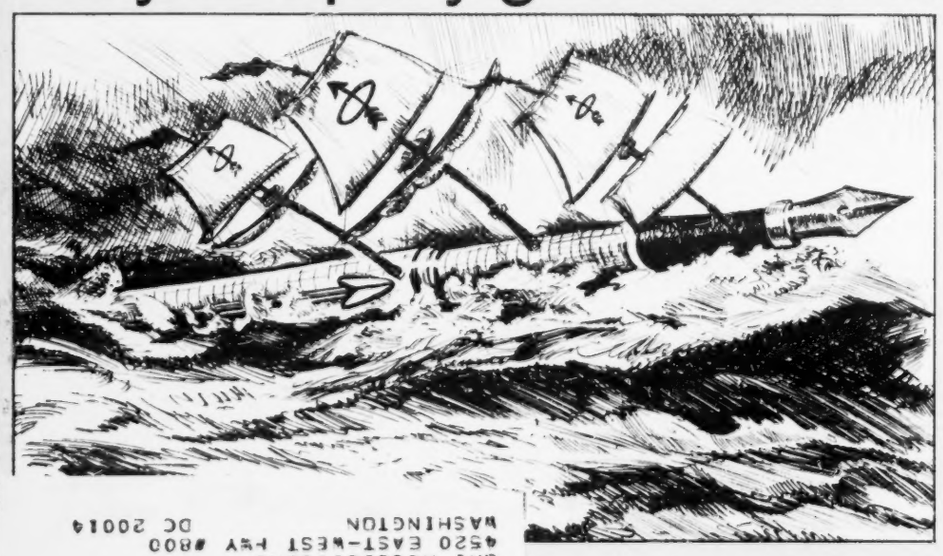
Parker Pen: What went wrong?

Why company global marketing plan foundered



By JOSEPH M. WINSKI and LAUREL WENTZ

JANESVILLE, WIS.—They gathered in the winter of 1984, uprooting families, abandoning secure jobs.

Richard Swart came from 3M in Minneapolis in January. Jack Marks followed in February from Gillette in Boston. Carlos Del Nero arrived two days later from Fisher-Price in New York.

Their leaders already were in place: James Peterson, a veteran from Pillsbury and R.J. Reynolds Industries, and Manville Smith, another 3M alumnus.

Individually they were some of the best and brightest minds of international marketing; collectively they were one of the most formidable teams of global business thinkers ever assembled.

What lured them to this sleepy little town in dairy country was a once-in-a-career opportunity. Janesville-based Parker Pen Co. planned to launch a global-marketing effort of perhaps unprecedented scope.

It was in some respects a quixotic venture. Parker Pen never had spent more than $20 million a year for advertising, and sales of the company's writing instruments never had topped $225 million—hardly the resources for mounting a big global assault.

But it was the sheer ambition of the effort, and its potential

Global marketing on the prairie 1
They were one of the most formidable teams of global business thinkers ever assembled. What lured them to this sleepy little town in dairy country was a once-in-a-career opportunity. Janesville-based Parker Pen Co. planned to launch a global-marketing effort of perhaps unprecedented scope. ADVERTISING AGE looks at what happened, and why.

Spectra struggles 3
Polaroid Corp.'s new Spectra may be an instant success in camera stores but the photography system's over-all retail strength is developing slowly. A $40 million ad campaign backing the camera has been undercut by distribution delays that have forced retailers to ration film and hold off on tie-in promotions.

New horizons for Interpublic 6
Negotiations are under way that, if successful, would add the Interpublic Group of Cos. to the ranks of mega-agencies that are expanding their business beyond advertising.

Tampon market revives 12
The $409 million tampon market, suffering since 1980 from links to toxic shock syndrome, is now seeing signs of unit growth again. Over-all unit sales were up 5% to 3.7 billion in 1985.

Stroh branches out 24
With entries into the cooler, nonalcoholic malt beverage and juice-added soft-drink categories, Detroit-based Stroh Brewery Co. is committing itself to becoming a broad-based beverage company, growth-oriented but less dependent on increasing its share of the flat domestic beer market.

Bic fires up lighter pitch 37
Bic Corp. is continuing its assault on the lighter market with an $8 million-to-$9 million advertising and promotion budget this year. Some 60% of that spending will go to the new Mini-Bic, a small disposable that fits into a cigaret pack.

Royal Crown fights back 4
Soft-drink industry pundits have all but written off feisty Royal Crown Cola Co. as a contender in the $16.4 billion cola wars. They say recent buyout proposals of Seven-Up Co. by PepsiCo and of Dr Pepper Co. by Coca-Cola Co. will create a virtual lock on the market. But RC hopes to increase its share of the total soft-drink market, though executives admit they have no chance of beating Coca-Cola and Pepsi. Rather, an improvement in profits, awareness and distribution for the RC brands are RC's primary goals.

Chevy deserts Monday football

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

General Motors' Chevrolet division last week pulled out of ABC-TV's "Monday Night Football" for 1986, just a month after ABC reportedly spurned GM's $43 million offer to be the exclusive domestic auto in the network's coverage of the 1988 Winter Olympic Games.

Chevy, which held the "Monday Night Football" domestic auto exclusivity or shared it with other GM divisions since 1979, walked away from what would have been at least a $25 million commitment this fall.

ABC vp-sports sales Larre Barrett said Ford Motor Co., Chrysler, Buick and Pontiac have taken positions in the football broadcasts. A fifth domestic auto is being

NEW YORK—It wasn't supposed to happen for at least two months, but the daytime upfront market has started moving.

The flurry of activity was completely unexpected in most quarters. Daytime remains the softest daypart in network tv and there has been little impetus in the buying community

Ad community toasts emerging creativity

By R. Craig Endicott and Cecelia Reed

After years of advertising that might as well have been stamped "Made Elsewhere," Italy's ad community has found its creative voice. It bespeaks the quality that underlies the nation's noted excellence in making food, fashion and fast cars, and reflects the Italian market's stable, though tightening economy.

Ad spending has been climbing in Italy, but the annual percentage increase declined. The resulting budgets, added to excessive tv ad clutter and growth in other advertising media, have ignited the need for greater creativity.

Total ad spending in Italy in 1986 is an estimated $2.67 billion, a 9.9% increase over 1985, according to ASSAP, the Italian agency association. Total ad spending in 1985 of $2.43 billion was up 14.6% from 1984, a 19.1% increase from 1983.

Economic expansion, which has stimulated advertising, spawned growth in Italian tv, which was cut loose from state control in the late 1970s. This growth, encouraged by regulatory oversight, has led to a profusion of commercials. The need to overcome such clutter has spurred shops, including RSCG Mezzano Costantini Mignani, STZ and Testa, Pella, Rossetti, Milan, to create advertising that stands out and is distinctly Italian to boot.

Legislation is pending to eliminate advertising clutter on state-run tv station RAI and the private stations. RAI has tried to diffuse the clutter by airing commercials in non-prime-time blocks; the national private stations, Canale 5, Italia 1 and RETE 4, have not.

Another problem for advertisers has been the confusion of media rates and prices. This unevenness has fostered the emergence of 14 independent media buying companies that sell media at discount prices. Recently, eight leading agencies formed their own group, Cristallo, to

Giugiaro leaves his mark on world's autos

By Claire Wilson

Twelve million of his cars, including Volkswagen Rabbits and Lotus Esprits, are on the road today. He has a taxi design in New York's Museum of Modern Art, and his signature is on the only designer pasta that exists.

With all this to his credit, one might expect Italian industrial designer Giorgetto Giugiaro to take some time off—a minute perhaps to collect his thoughts or half an hour for lunch without the telephone ringing.

But slow is not Mr. Giugiaro's style. Seated in a conference room in the sleek headquarters of his company, Ital Design, in an industrial park on the outskirts of Turin, Mr. Giugiaro's repartee is a flow of one idea after another. He talks excitedly and jokes frequently, making sketches on a notepad to illustrate his point.

How busy is he? An aide jokes that the only successful meetings he can manage with the head man are running from his office to the model room.

"It's a long haul and he has no choice but to listen," the aide shrugs. "It's the only way."

Apparently, this pace is status quo for Mr. Giugiaro, the 48-year-old son of a Piedmontese fresco painter. With his northern Italian polish and good looks, he has the air of a person who rarely gets nervous about anything—as long as things move along quickly enough. Watching Mr. Giugiaro, the designer of the Fiat Uno and the Renault 5 as well as a Nikon camera and a Seiko watch, it is clear he and the group at Ital Design thrive on such a pace. "We are like a jet. If we don't stay at 1,000 kilometers, we go down," he says.

Anyone who follows car design knows his career is only picking up speed. In its third annual 10 best issue last year, Car and Driver magazine called Mr. Giugiaro "the world's best living automotive designer." Aldo Mantovani, Mr. Giugiaro's technical collaborator for almost 20 years, says the two now are working as they never have before. "At this point, Giugiaro is giving the best of himself," Mr. Mantovani says.

Some of that best is Detroit-bound. Like countryman Sergio Pininfarina, the designer of the recently unveiled Cadillac Allante, Mr. Giugiaro is at work on projects for the U.S. One is a midpriced, two-seater sports car for Ford that should be introduced in the late 1980s. The other projects have not been made public.

Mr. Giugiaro is much praised for his ability to create beautiful cars known for space and cost efficiency. He boasts he can engineer a prototype and calculate the man-hours needed to produce the car. He considers it part of Ital Design's service.

Giorgetto Giugiaro, who designed the Ibiza, believes in breaking rules in his designs.

Mr. Giugiaro got his start in automotive design at the age of 17 when he went to work at the Fiat styling center after graduating from the Turin Academy of Fine Arts. In 1959, he joined Carrozzeria Bertone, a car design studio, and in 1968, he was appointed director of the Ghia styling and prototype center in Turin. He founded Ital Design with his two partners, Mr. Mantovani and Mario Maioli, that year.

Ital Design was among the first to offer design engineering, prototype construction, final assembly process and manufacturing study in addition to presentation, model styling and construction services traditionally offered by such design studios.

Among Mr. Giugiaro's greatest successes are the Volkswagen Dasher and the original VW Scirocco, the Delta, Thema and Prisma for Lancia, the Fiat Panda and the Uno. There are 1.5 million Unos on the road and, according to Mr. Maioli, Fiat styling director, such cars are where Mr. Giugiaro exerts his real talent for innovative automotive design. "Smaller cars really allow him to express his creativity," Mr. Maioli says.

Critics of industrial design concur that Mr. Giugiaro makes beautiful cars, at any price. "He is a master of aesthetics and proportion," says Nigel Chapman, head of Transport Design at London's Royal College of Art. "He is a visionary in terms of analyzing new developments in cars, but his most extraordinary quality is his versatility."

Mr. Giugiaro might well be one of the most versatile designers to come down the pike. He is also responsible for the Alfa Romeo Alfasud, the Audi 4000, the Ferrari 250GT and the Maserati Bora.

His name is a selling point in TBWA Advertising's European campaign for the Spanish SEAT Ibiza, which he designed, and a prototype he did was the forerunner to such people carriers as the Renault Espace, the Nissan Prairie and the Honda Shuttle.

Ital Design turns out about 20 car designs a year, but Mr. Giugiaro has several other outlets for his creative energy. The pasta he designed was for Naples-based pasta maker Voiello, and it was the first new pasta shape in 50 years. Under a separate design division, Giugiaro Design, he has created a line of men's clothing for the Seiko Group in Japan, interiors for Agusta Helicopters, Parker Pens, office furnishing for Tecno, major appliances for Candy and a Necchi sewing machine.

His reputation for solving design problems is evident in a Seiko watch with a slanted crystal, so drivers don't have to strain to read it, and his design for the Nikon F3 camera where he put the motor on a slant for better balance.

Mr. Giugiaro, who is married and has two children, allows that he may be a little impulsive, but not being afraid to take design risks is part of his success. It is in that way the partners complement each other, according to Mr. Mantovani. "He's the one who says, 'Let's take the chance,'" the associate says. "And I say, yes, but . . . ."

Mr. Giugiaro already has experience in Detroit and does not expect to exercise any caprices with the big three U.S. auto makers. He lets on that Detroit's consumer pretesting of designs can be nerve-racking to the designer of the cars of the future, but he views it as a test of sorts for himself.

"I know that when one of my designs is accepted by the consumer panels," he says, "it is already obsolete and I have to get back to work." AA combat this encroachment.

The feverish merger activity affecting major advertisers and agencies on a global basis has company in Italy, particularly in the foreign-dominated agency business.

Of the 36 Italian agencies reported in the April 21 Advertising Age Foreign Income Report, only six were independent of either affiliation status or ownership from abroad. The affiliated shops accounted for $1.15 billion in billings in 1985, or 47.3% of the national ad pie.

The top three agencies are McCann-Erickson Italiana, J. Walter Thompson Italia and Foote, Cone & Belding, all U.S.-based.

The decline in oil prices should give Italy's economy an extra boost this year. Its gross domestic product, initially forecast to grow 2.0% in 1986 when oil prices were more than $25 a barrel, instead should hit 3.0% now that prices have dropped to less than $18 a barrel. This compares with 2.5% growth in 1985 when oil prices were higher. Oil is by far Italy's major import commodity. The country's economic fortunes also hang on internal developments in two major export markets--the U.S. and West Germany.

After years of soaring inflation, Prime Minister Bettino Craxi's Socialist government has brought inflation to 9% at the start of this year from 16% in 1983.

An annual reading of 6.5% to 7% is predicted by yearend. Unemployment remains a relatively stable 10%.

Italy's trade deficit continues to be nettlesome as imports are expected to grow 6% while exports increase 5%, predicts Business International Corp., New York, an international business consulting company, which notes those percentages are subject to change depending on oil prices. Italy had a $6.3 billion trade deficit in 1985. Should the depreciation of the dollar continue through 1986, however, Italy's balance-of-payments deficit could improve, according to Business International reports.

Lower inflation and an estimated 9% rise in wages (only a 1% increase in real wages) is not expected to stimulate the economy internally in 1986.

This economic leveling off will be reflected on the agency side. Italy's seventh largest agency, Ata Univas, for example, sees an increase of only 3.5% in billings in 1986, compared with 7.1% and 11% gains in 1985 and 1984, respectively, during more heady periods of economic and advertising growth. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in image but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches)
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches
   Divide the Total Lines of Page by the Number of MRCS SAU Inches of the Page

Clients' 'retaliation' increases

An Advertising Age roundup

Mars Inc.'s longtime U.S. relationship with Ted Bates Advertising has come "under study" in the latest example of growing opposition by major advertisers to the recent agency megamergers.

The opposition, focused on a variety of new account conflicts, ranges from strong statements of concern or displeasure to switching of accounts.

In making its case against agency megamergers that create new account-conflict problems, Procter & Gamble last week began rewarding its nonmerging agencies. And Mars Inc., along with expressions of concern over U.S. conflicts arising out of the Bates-Saatchi & Saatchi deal, gave an as-yet-unknown assignment to Grey Advertising in London.

Other anxious or angry clients are General Mills, RJR Nabisco and Colgate-Palmolive.

Their responses to date, and those expected to come, are a far cry from the votes of confidence the megamerged agencies had anticipated. The belief that a more relaxed attitude about account conflicts was evolving in the wake of the big mergers has begun to evaporate.

That client qualms are progressively becoming less private was evident when P&G seized the initiative by reassigning some of its newly acquired brands (AA, June 2). Cincinnati-based P&G gave new pieces of business to Wells, Rich, Greene (Oil of Olay), Leo Burnett Co. and Tatham-Laird & Kudner, taking accounts from Young & Rubicam, a major worldwide agency of rival Colgate-Palmolive, and Needham Harper Worldwide, which will be linked via its new holding company to BBDO, a key agency of a major P&G rival, Unilever.

But the picture is not altogether bleak. Other clients, particularly in the auto industry—where agency sharing under umbrella setups is a long-standing practice—are coming to terms with megamergers in mutually satisfactory ways.

At this point, however, short-term reactions indicate major advertisers are closely watching each other's moves—and especially P&G's—to help their internal deliberations along. The question is whether the megamerged agencies can persuade clients to go along with them, or, failing that, see the non-

Xerox hopes Bates has keys to office market

By BRIAN MORAN

Xerox Corp. will lean heavily on new agency Ted Bates Advertising/New York to reignite the company's decadelong struggle to win a significant share of the office-automation market.

As expected (AA, June 2), Bates last week won a four-agency shootout for Stamford, Conn.-based Xerox's $41 million corporate and business systems products account, formerly handled by Needham Harper Worldwide. Bates' first creative work is expected to break by early August.

The assignment will put less emphasis on corporate image and copier products advertising, according to Michael Kirby, Xerox corporate advertising and promotion director. "We're more than a copier company," Mr. Kirby said. "We have [office] systems capability and we want to make sure people are aware of our presence in that business."

Xerox's office-systems products are manufactured and marketed by the company's Rochester, N.Y.-based business-systems group. Mr. Kirby said the new advertising will be "jointly managed" by himself and Douglas McLaine, the Rochester group's marketing communications manager. Mr. McLaine joined Mr. Kirby at Xerox's June 6 press conference announcing the account move.

Xerox executives said Bates won the business because of its execution of a "focused assignment" that Xerox gave to the agency and three other New York shops that competed for the account—DFS Dorland Worldwide, Scali, McCabe, Sloves and SSC&B. Xerox two weeks ago narrowed the search to Bates and DFS.

Sources report Bates snared the account partly on the strength of strategy points developed by Larry Light, president of the agency's international division. The Bates team also included president Donald Zuckert, exec vp Randall Hackett and Ralph Rydholm, the agency's recently hired creative head.

Mr. Zuckert said Bates will continue to handle the account of personal computer marketer Commodore International Ltd. Commodore's operation—targeted mainly at home users—does not conflict with Xerox's

Trident gum tries cavity-fighter image in $15M campaign

By PATRICIA WINTERS

Trident gum joins mouthwashes, cereals and other foods that make health-benefit claims with a new $15 million-plus campaign that repositions the No. 1-selling sugarless gum as a cavity-fighter.

The multimedia campaign for Trident, from Warner-Lambert Co.'s American Chicle division, Morris Plains, N.J., cites new research (AA, June 2) that chewing sugarless gum after eating sugary snacks may help prevent cavities.

American Chicle will replace its current network tv and radio campaign with the new spots beginning June 12, via Ted Bates Advertising/New York. Commercials focus on a new study showing Trident's cavity-preventing benefits.

The company declined to disclose ad spending, but said it would exceed last year's budget. The brand received $15.5 million in measured media last year, according to Leading National Advertisers.

"We believe it [the new campaign] is very significant," said John Carroll, Warner-Lambert vp and Chicle president. "It's the first time a product of this sort is making this claim, and we are support-

Back in the game 4
Home videogames, the spectacular rags-to-riches-to-rags electronics gadgetry of the late 1970s and early 1980s, are poised for a rebirth. That's the word from three major marketers hawking a new generation of game consoles and cartridges loaded with improved graphics at last week's Consumer Electronics Show.

Death of a designer 6
Designer Perry Ellis' death has brought into question not only the fate of his $260 million fashion and fragrance empire, but the future of "key man" insurance, often essential in industries in which a person personifies a company.

On the scent 28
The next fashion marketer to chase the scent of success may be designer Donna Karan, if another challenger, Cosmair, doesn't get there first with Notorious. A Karan executive confirmed that Ms. Karan has talked with Halston Fragrances about a fragrance of her own. She also has met with representatives of Estee Lauder and Revlon.

A Lowe blow 80
When the Standard Oil Co. (Ohio) fired Lowe Marschalk last month, it was more than just another business loss for the agency's Cleveland office. The 75-year-old account, originally handled in-house for Standard by McCann-Erickson founder Harrison McCann, represented one of the first pieces of business for what is now the Interpublic Group of Cos.

Oklahoma ad ban dumped 86
Oklahoma media will accept their first liquor and wine advertising in 25 years, following a federal court ruling that overturned a statewide ban.

Big gainer for game maker 89
Interactive VCR Games is gearing up to take on its giant competitors by advertising its newest product on ABC-TV's "Monday Night Football." The small Vancouver, Wash.-based company will spend $2 million to advertise its VCR Quarterback Game on "MNF" this fall because it is a "perfect" media buy.

Chrysler, Ford ads quarrel on quality

By JESSE SNYDER

ANN ARBOR, MICH.—Ford Motor Co. broke a new round of print ads last week reasserting its "best built" cars and trucks claim that Chrysler is challenging.

Chrysler, meanwhile, struck a new blow of its own by breaking hard-hitting network tv commercial June 5 claiming quality superiority over Ford. Ford had challenged the new commercial before network review committees.

The commercial, via Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Birmingham, Mich., is an extension of Chrysler's print campaign.

Based on an updated survey that includes 1986 model cars, the Ford ads, via J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, claim Ford produces the

Discounts spoil nets' daytime

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—Some advertisers say they are buying upfront daytime tv at discounts from 10% to 20% off 1985 prices, bringing to an end the once-automatic daytime price increases to which the Big 3 networks had grown accustomed.

If this trend continues, the economics of the business could be turned upside down. For example, daytime tv, for years the nets' most profitable daypart, likely will yield that distinction to late-night tv by the time the upfront season concludes this summer.

And, at the prices nets are said to be selling at now, this year's daytime upfront season

Ellis death raises 'key' insurance questions

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—Designer Perry Ellis' death has brought into question not only the fate of his $260 million fashion and fragrance empire, but the future of "key man" insurance, which is often essential in industries where a person personifies a company.

As of now, and certainly through this year, retailers, licensees of Perry Ellis products and financial analysts expect it will be business as usual at the enterprises of Mr. Ellis, 46, who died May 30. Beyond that, however, industry sources believe the continued success of Perry Ellis products will depend on whether future designs reflect his heritage of modern traditionalism.

It also depends, they say, on whether the consumer actually cares that, after 10 years, Mr. Ellis is no longer around to oversee the creation of men's and women's clothes that have glamorized every look from the slightly sloppy to the pure preppy, while remaining casual but classy.

Persistent speculation that the designer had Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome might also affect future sales, some sources allowed.

The official cause of death was given as viral encephalitis, a brain inflammation.

Said one executive close to Perry Ellis International, "This is the first time that it appears a really well known designer's life style has affected his life. I think his name means a lot and it will survive. But I think some of the products that are less fashion-oriented and based on a more emotional, sexual appeal, such as the fragrances, may have a tougher time."

The unconfirmed reports that Mr. Ellis died of AIDS are familiar to Ronald Cohen, owner of Hiram Cohen & Sons, a Williston Park, N.Y.-based insurance company that writes personal and professional policies for much of the apparel industry.

Mr. Cohen's company did not write the $5 million key-man policy that Manhattan Industries—marketer of Perry Ellis Menswear and Portfolio—is being paid, according to New York-based financial analysts.

But when asked if the rumors surrounding Mr. Ellis' death might make it harder for fashion companies to get insurance on key men, Mr. Cohen said, "That's already begun. Even before this. It's much harder to get insurance for designers than it was two years ago.

"Once written, a policy is locked in. I have lost several designers to AIDS where the policy was written before it was known they had a problem. Right now, I have one man who's a very big label on the street who I can't get insurance for, because he leads the kind of life style where he's considered a candidate."

Mr. Ellis is not the first fashion designer rumored to have been sick with AIDS.

Three years ago, Calvin Klein was harassed for months with the same rumor before he and his doctor finally had to make public denials which were published in Women's Wear Daily.

To be a designer and be linked with AIDS is feared because of what it might do to both public image and business

But so far, despite Mr. Ellis' death and the rumors connected with it, Mr. Ellis' business appears not to have suffered.

Noted Linda Hopler, vp-fashion director for Saks Fifth Avenue, "If the clothes are beautiful and they're created in the spirit of Perry, they'll still sell.

"We have a lot of things that aren't designed by anybody but customers buy them because they are wonderful.

"If the clothes change and they don't have the spirit of Perry, that's another question. Anne Klein actually got more interest from consumers after [the late designer's successors] took over."

Norman Fryman, president of the Greif Cos., New York, currently licenses Perry Ellis tailored clothing and is now negotiating another license for the designer's Portfolio line.

Neither the death nor the rumors, Mr. Fryman said, will affect his existing agreements nor the terms of future agreements: "Not at all. We trust the design staff at Perry Ellis and the organization under Robert McDonald [president of Perry Ellis International] will continue as it has, and so we have no problems with the association."

Jay Meltzer, analyst with Goldman, Sachs, said that even with the designer's death, Manhattan Industries is a stronger company than it was last year, due to a restructuring of its own. As for Perry Ellis International, he also thinks that it will continue to grow but, he added, "a central point of this is the Levi Strauss operation with Perry Ellis America. It's doing much better than a year ago, so there's momentum, and they should be in a position to capitalize on it."

When this line first debuted it was expected to produce sales of $30 million-plus at wholesale.

Instead it has just reached $20 million at wholesale, according to sources who attribute the shortfall during its first year to problems with fit, among other things.

A Levi spokesman said that, as of now, the company is pleased with the pickup on the line, adding that there are no plans for reviewing it.

Levi's contract is good through 1987, and renegotiations are scheduled to begin at the end of this year.

Kitty Hawks, corporate creative director for Perry Ellis, said that no announcements are ready to be made yet as to who will assume control of design for Mr. Ellis' operations over-all. She also said there have been no problems with clients, licensees or banks following his death.#

Companies bring logos and profits full circle

By Eileen Norris

If you've tasted Nabisco's Oreo Cookies'n Cream ice cream or tried on the Coca-Cola line of Murjani apparel, then you've become a tenant in a lucrative business that's turning corporations into landlords that rent their logos, trademarks or brand names to product marketers. In return for the rights to those valued properties, the product marketers cross the company's palm with cash in the form of royalties on sales of the licensed goods.

The business of corporate licensing is becoming the envy of those corporations that haven't cashed in on the windfall or can't. "Probably 80% of the public knows the brand name Preparation H, but it's probably not something you'll see on the back of t-shirts," says Weston Anson, president, Marketing/Trademark Consultants, La Jolla, Cal.

Corporate licensing, a $14 billion annual business, usually is divided into two categories: Brand awareness and brand extension, says Nancy Bailey, president of the Miami-based licensing consultancy bearing her name.

With brand awareness licensing, a corporation permits a marketer to produce a product emblazoned with its registered trademark, logo, slogan. For example, St. Louis-based Seven-Up Co. licensed its name to a company that packaged everything from handkerchiefs to nightshirts inside an imitation 7UP can.

The other form of corporate licensing, brand extension licensing, is getting a big shot in the arm. A marketer of ice cream or apparel, for example, will link up with a successful corporation's brand or trademark and come out with new products that the trademark-owning company does not directly produce.

Others say corporate licensing cannot be bro-

Louisville Slugger hits one out of the ballpark

By Lori Kesler

The folks who make Louisville Sluggers never said their wands worked magic, but plenty of people seem willing to believe it. And Hillerich & Bradsby Co., which has been turning out Louisville Sluggers for more than 100 years, knows better than to mess with a good myth.

There was the time, for example, the Cincinnati Reds asked H&B to help pull them out of a batting slump.

> "... our name still has a great degree of magic to it—and licensing helps support that."
> Bill Williams
> Hillerich & Bradsby

A company employe dispatched a new supply of Louisville Sluggers with some solar-powered advice: Let the bats lie in the sun outside the dugout before using them.

The Reds did as they were told and started hitting again. The H&B employe later admitted he'd concocted the advice to prove baseball is "90% psychological."

And so, it seems, is the power of the Louisville Slugger name.

"Few words evoke such feelings of nostalgia and reminiscence," says Bill Williams, H&B's vp-advertising and licensing.

Recognized by eight out of 10 Americans, the Louisville Slugger name conjures up memories of baseball heroes and childhood sandlot games.

This may help to explain why grandparents and parents swathe their toddlers in sleepers bearing the logo of a sports equipment marketer.

Infant's and children's clothes have turned out to be some of Louisville Slugger's most successful licensed items. At first this surprised Mr. Williams.

"Our strength really lies with people 25 years and older," he says. "They're the ones who grew up with Louisville Slugger." Parents may be attempting to steal back a segment of their youth when they buy Louisville Slugger clothes for their children.

Men purchase almost one-third of all Slugger duds, according to Weston Anson, president, Marketing/Trademark Consultants, La Jolla, Cal., H&B's licensing agent. One-third may not sound too astounding, except men buy less than 10% of children's apparel, he says.

The children's clothes, licensed by U.S. Apparel, New York, have been sold through a wide range of retail outlets from K-mart to Bloomingdale's, something of a rarity in apparel marketing.

The line now is being carried more by upscale stores, however, says Jerry Perelmutter, exec vp, U.S. Apparel. Because U.S.-manufactured apparel typically is more costly, the lower end chain stores look for foreign-produced products.

He says New York's Macy's and several other department store chains are setting up permanent Louisville Slugger displays in their boys' clothing departments. The apparel line is expected to be promoted heavily during the fall back-to-school sales season.

Despite the strong brand identity among adults, H&B officials say Louisville Slugger's licensing program will continue to focus on kids.

The company figures one way to make sure children grow up with the Slugger name on their minds is to slug it on their clothes, their toys, even their toothbrushes.

Mr. Williams says H&B got into licensing for all the usual reasons—to generate revenues, penetrate new market areas and reinforce brand identity. But, he says, the company also wanted to use licensing to establish and strengthen its relationship with young children.

"There was a time when we were the only game in town," Mr. Williams says. "That's not the case today." Thanks to the miracles of high tech, children these days are learning to play ball with aluminum bats, which are lighter and more durable than wood.

Aluminum dominates virtually every area of amateur softball and baseball—only in professional baseball does wood reign supreme. That complicates things for H&B, which made 6 million wooden bats in 1975 and only 1 million last year.

"We own the wooden bat market. We do not own the aluminum market," Mr. Williams says. While 60% to 65% of all wooden bats sold in this country are Louisville Sluggers, fewer than 25% of aluminum bats carry the famous name.

Wooden and aluminum bats aren't H&B's only products. The bulk of the company's $50 million annual revenues now come from Louisville Slugger baseball and softball gloves, mitts and batting gloves, Louisville hockey sticks and Powerbilt golf clubs.

"We have to fight harder these days for our share of market [in all product categories]," Mr. Williams says. "However, we benefit from the fact that our name still has a great degree of magic to it—and licensing helps support that."

The licensing program keeps the name in the public eye "so kids will grow up knowing us not just for wooden bats," Mr. Williams says, "but for all our products."

In addition to children's clothes and hosiery, H&B has licensed plastic toy bat-and-ball sets, a toy battery-operated pitching machine, batting tee and a toothbrush shaped like a baseball bat.

A line of men's sportswear also recently reached retail. The clothes, licensed by MFB Industries, Gastonia, N.C., feature 12 styles of baseball shirts, t-shirts, sweat shirts and pants.

The company wants to license a line of linens, home furnishings and accessories sometime in the future.

And Mr. Williams says the company's cache of old baseball photographs are ripe for the picking. If all goes according to plan, a Louisville Slugger coffeetable book could be in the offing.

Mr. Anson says H&B has been careful to limit the number of licenses it grants. "They could easily have done lots of windup dolls and toys and all the usual garbage," he says. "But their goal was never to have more than eight or ten product licensees."

When a company licenses just a few products, "consumers assume that company actually makes those items," he says. "So it's important to give them quality products in a few select areas to maintain their trust." When a licensed name gets stamped on too many things, it no longer adds much value, Mr. Anson says.

If Louisville Slugger doesn't draw quite the same frenzied response as a name like E.T., that's not all bad, Mr. Anson says, because "an E.T. doesn't last. Neither do the licensed characters.

"Retailers are getting tired of the short-lived stuff, he says. "But Louisville Slugger is timeless. It's never going out of style."

Ironically, H&B likes to license products that don't depend too heavily on the Louisville Slugger name. "We want quality products that could stand on their own," Mr. Williams says. "Our reputation could be damaged if something were poorly made."

On the other hand, he says, H&B does not look to affiliate itself with the leading manufacturer in a product category. The company prefers to strike up partnerships with companies that make a good product, "but need our name to get them in the door."

Although he will not provide anticipated sales figures, Mr. Perelmutter says putting Louisville Slugger on his company's children's clothes may boost sales volume 6% to 8%, but he emphasizes quality is the far more important factor. "If the product doesn't have intrinsic value," he says, "it's not going to sell, no matter what."

> "Retailers are getting tired of the short-lived stuff. But Louisville Slugger is timeless."
> Marketing/Trademark Consultants

Prospective and current licensees are not expecting an overnight success, Mr. Williams says. "They're looking for a long-term relationship."

For its part, H&B also doesn't expect to get rich quick with licensing. The company pulled in about $150,000 in royalties in 1985, the first year it had any licensed products on the retail market, he says.

"We broke even and learned a lot," Mr. Williams says. "We know you can't look at the flashier part of licensing—the blockbuster celebrity stuff—and expect corporate licensing to be the same."

That's true, says Milton Schulman, editor of The Licensing Book, New York. The corporate licenser—if it's doing things right—doesn't try to cover all the bases at once, he says. Instead, it picks a market niche where its name has the greatest significance.

Louisville Slugger, for example, represents a kind of nostalgic involvement with America's greatest sport, so H&B officials have tailored their licensing program to capitalize on that appeal, Mr. Schulman says. "They know who responds to their name," he says, "and they're looking to license products that strike a chord with those people."

H&B appears to be realistic in its expectations. "Maybe we don't have as much pizazz as a Rambo," he says. "We don't have anything that's sparkling and brand new. But we do have a name that's an American classic."

Ty Cobb and Babe Ruth thought so. They endorsed Louisville Slugger bats, as did Ted Williams, Hank Aaron, Mickey Mantle, Roger Maris, Johnny Bench and George Brett.

So take that, Rambo.

H&B strikes up relationships with manufacturers that need Louisville Slugger's name to score.

Coca-Cola finds Murjani clothes are it

By Beth Sherman

If Coca-Cola Co. executives started to search for a tag line to hang on their licensing venture it might be "Coke goes better with clothes" or "Clothes are it." Aware that clothing represents about 40% of total corporate licensing revenues, company executives latched onto the idea of licensing a line of contemporary sportswear that would best reflect Atlanta-based Coke's lifestyle advertising.

In 1982, when the company established its first corporate licensing department and stamped its trademark on everything from beach towels to ice buckets and puzzles to posters, it launched a search for a licensee to manufacture apparel. Two years later representatives from New York-based Murjani International appeared on Coke's doorstep; Coke marketers finally found what they sought.

The co-venture is considered by many to be a prime example of corporate licensing at its best. In Murjani, Coke has found a company that not only has produced a fashion-oriented, quality product line, but also one that has merchandised the product in an innovative, exciting way.

"Murjani shares the same goals and aspirations that we do," says R. Bruce Gilbert, manager-merchandise licensing at Coca-Cola. "Instead of dribbling a few pieces out into the marketplace, they brought a high degree of integrity, design know-how and marketing skill to the project. Just look at their track record. They built up their Gloria Vanderbilt line from a pair of black jeans to a multi-million-dollar business."

The Coca-Cola clothing line—consisting of men's wear, women's wear, children's wear, lingerie, swimwear, sleepwear, maternity wear and accessories—is designed to complement the soft drink's image. The clothes are upbeat, made of cotton and denim, and fashioned in bold primary colors. Geared to appeal to consumers between the ages of 18 and 30, they epitomize the energetic youthfulness that Coke's product advertising has long represented.

Murjani marketers extensively researched the field, conducting focus groups and mall intercept interviews even before they approached Coca-Cola. What the clothing marketer found was that people responded positively to the Coke name, associating it with value and quality.

"Because of the advertising Coke had done over the years, it turned out that people had a picture in their minds of what the clothes would look like," says Carol Fox, a Murjani spokeswoman. "They envisioned a leisure-time life-style line. Also we tried to come up with the type of clothing that might be worn in a Coke commercial."

Murjani defined the market and the consumer segment it wanted to reach and then translated Coca-Cola's image to the clothes, says Milton Schulman, editor of The Licensing Book, a New York-based trade publication. "The clothes line was a breakthrough because it showed that a corporate logo, a brand name with high awareness, could be transformed into something very much like a designer name. And that's a first in corporate licensing."

Coca-Cola executives say their only objective in seeking a licensed apparel line was to protect the trademark. Since the venture was launched in August, 1985, Mr. Gilbert says, the unauthorized use of the company's trademark has dwindled.

Although the line's volume represents only a fraction of the company's total revenues—earnings of $722.3 million on sales of $7.9 billion last year—its success certainly has exceeded expectations.

Murjani projects retail sales of $200 million in fiscal 1986, far exceeding the company's original projections, which the company will not reveal. Ms. Fox says Coke's royalty "is standard for the industry," meaning it probably stands around 6% of wholesale sales. "This has been the most successful line that Murjani has ever had," she says, "including Gloria Vanderbilt."

Given corporate licensing's pitfalls and problems, Murjani and Coke took some deliberate steps upfront to forge their partnership. Both sides made moves to ensure the line's quality corresponded with the consumer respect awarded to Coke's name and image. To this end, each garment was tested to make sure it did not shrink, fade, stretch or tear.

"The greatest risk in corporate licensing is that the products will not represent good value and good design," says Michael Stone, president of New York-based Hamilton Projects, which acted as the licensing agent. "The single most important asset a corporation has is its name, so the last thing a company wants is to see closeouts on the sidewalks of 14th St."

Satisfied with the finished products, Murjani conjured up a merchandising style that utilized a high-tech, futuristic approach. In Murjani's two Fizazz specialty retail stores—located on Columbus Ave. in New York and the Paramus Park Mall in Paramus, N.J.—customers use video screens to view ensembles. The clothes are stocked cafeteria-style, with consumers placing their selections on trays.

The children's wear and other lines of Coca-Cola licensed clothing are designed to complement the soft drink's image.

Despite the program's success and groundbreaking retailing style, both companies admit the process was slow and based largely on trial and error.

"It is difficult for a licenser to enter a category it is not familiar with," says Arnold Bolka, publisher of industry newsletter "The Licensing Letter," Scottsdale, Ariz. "It's one thing for a toy licenser to enter the toy business; it's another thing if that same company enters the food business."

Coca-Cola executives acknowledge it took a while to adjust to retailing, with its longer manufacturing and lead times. "We learned that it takes several months, if not over a year, from the startup to the shelf," Mr. Gilbert says.

Along the way, Murjani made some discoveries of its own. When the company first began planning to merchandise the line, it came up with a nostalgia-type theme, which was supposed to tie in with Coke's back-to-America's-roots advertising approach.

The first design for the specialty stores revolved around imagery borrowed from a 1940s-style soda fountain.

"Initially, it made perfect sense," Ms. Fox says. "But it just

Fizazz adds pizazz to retail stores

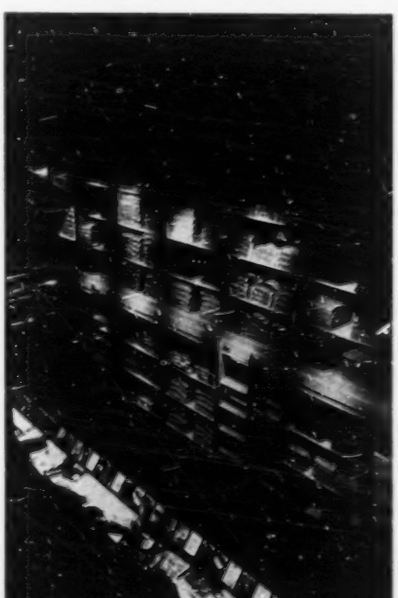
Fizazz . . . sounds like a cross between pizazz and carbonation gone wild. Soft drink marketers might have considered this as a new product name if New York-based Murjani International didn't beat them to it and use it as the label for its retail outlets featuring Coca-Cola Co. licensed apparel.

"We opened our own stores because we wanted to have our own showcase for the clothes," says Carol Fox, Murjani spokeswoman. "This is how shopping will be in the future."

The two Fizazz stores are high-tech retailing wonders. Located in New York and Paramus, N.J., the 1,000-sq.-ft. outlets are decorated in white and gray, with stainless steel fixtures and industrial rubber flooring.

Consumers entering the Manhattan store, located in the heart of chic Columbus Ave., confront two video screens and an entire menu of the store's selection. Select the "women's tops" category, for instance, and a range of sweat shirts, jackets, sweaters and t-shirts parades across the video screen. Pressing the video screen while a top is displayed will provide information on pricing, fabric, sizes and colors. Those who want another perspective can request different pictures of the items that include front and back views and closeups of collars and cuffs.

On the lower floor, a selection of clothes—striped polo shirts, drawstring shorts, miniskirts and tank tops—are arranged cafeteria-style on a stainless steel cart. The bulk of the line is made of cotton and denim in bold primary colors of red, yellow and blue, sprinkled with white and kelly green. The Coke logo shows prominently on some articles; on others it can be found only on the label.



More clothes are stacked overhead in cubicles, sending sales help clambering up ladders to retrieve them. The comfortable and casual line retails for between $30 and $60.

Some of the clothes are whimsical. One t-shirt features a cartoon character with a soda can on his chest and reads "Coca-Cola man to the rescue." Another shirt depicts an island setting where tourists carrying Coca-Cola satchels and luggage confront friendly natives. Other styles, like a white cotton camp shirt or a pair of khaki shorts, represent classic cuts and styles.

Murjani brings out new selections six times a year, a standard practice for women's ready to wear lines. "We feel fresh merchandise is important to make the point that this is not a promotional line, but a real sportswear line," Ms. Fox says.

Murjani expects to open another 50 stores in major markets by the end of this year, Ms. Fox says. The locations are being selected carefully, she says, to avoid conflict with retailers' franchises.

In New York, Fizazz is open seven days a week, until as late as 11 p.m. on Friday and Saturday. In the evenings, the video age meets the wonderful world of retailing as five front window monitors project surreal images—and the clothes—to passersby.

For the ultimate shopper, a 24-hour service using devices similar to automated teller machines reportedly is being considered. Customers would be able to order merchandise, pay by credit card and get next-day delivery.

The stores draw an eclectic customer mix. Recently, before the Manhattan store opened, two teen-age girls, two middle-age Japanese tourists, one Texas cowboy complete with 10-gallon hat and one punked-out young man already were in line. Once inside, the teen agers rushed past the video screens to the cart of clothes downstairs.

"Isn't this terrific?" said one, pointing to a periwinkle-colored vest dotted with the Coca-Cola logo. "What will they think of next?"

didn't work. The clothes were so new and fresh that we needed a whole new concept. We began to visualize a 21st century situation, and that's how the whole futuristic concept evolved."

Meanwhile, Murjani tried to convince retailers that the first large-scale attempt to graft a corporate name onto designer goods would sell and that it would sell best if the stores set aside 450 sq. ft. of floor space to create in-store Coca-Cola clothing shops.

"When we first made the licensing announcement, an awful lot of department stores were unsure that the concept was right for them," Ms. Fox says.

"We held a press conference, and there were no clothes, no designs. All we had was a terrific concept with a lot of research to back it up."

Ten stores, including Macy's in New York, Rich's in Atlanta and Carson Pirie Scott in Chicago, agreed to gamble. Today, 350 retailers have decided they have some extra space for the line and have jumped on the licensing bandwagon.

Murjani's $7 million ad campaign, handled by Lois, Pitts, Gershon, takes full advantage of cross-promotions, special events and tie-ins between retailers and local Coca-Cola bottlers. Philadelphia-based John Wanamaker's, for example, raffled off a car provided by a bottling company. Rich's co-sponsored a fashion show in conjuction with its local Coke plant.

After the line was launched, Murjani ran into another snag. One retailer ran an ad promoting the line as "all-American." That angered U.S. textile manufacturers who said most of the clothes were manufactured in the Far East.

The outcry prompted Murjani to dramatically increase production in the U.S.

New items manufactured in the past six months—such as pajamas, swimsuits, maternity dresses and handbags—have been produced in Murjani's U.S. plants.

The hubbub hasn't kept Coca-Cola executives from thinking foreign thoughts. Although its corporate licensing program currently is confined to the U.S., the company is looking to safeguard its trademark "and plug up any holes in selected European countries," Mr. Gilbert says.

Coke's primary soft drink competitor perhaps has seen a silver lining in the furor over foreign production. Purchase, N.Y.-based Pepsi-Cola Co. is bringing out its own line of licensed apparel this fall. The licensee is VP Corp., New York, the largest publicly held apparel company in America and the maker of Lee jeans. A VF spokesman says the company will play up the fact in BBDO-created ads that the line of contemporary sportswear will be produced entirely in the U.S.

But it may take more than the current fervor for protectionism to catch up to Coke's enviable head start in licensing corporate image apparel. "A lot of companies are going to try to copy Coke's success," Hamilton Project's Mr. Stone says. "But Coke has a definite advantage because it's the first.

"The designs are so great, the visibility is so high," he says. "How do you do it better? How do you top it?"

Those are the questions the licensing and retailing worlds will watch VF and Pepsi grapple with this fall. Perhaps they will prove Pepsi consumers actually are "the apparel generation."

Characters make the most of their short life spans

By Sara E. Stern

Rainbow Brite has taken it upon herself to rid the world of evil. With the help of seven "lieutenants," this little girl keeps a vigil, spreading color and happiness to children and adults everywhere: A pretty tall order for a 3-year-old.

But Rainbow Brite is old beyond her years. Since her introduction in 1983, the vividly clad sprite, her colorful co-workers, her pony, Starlite, and a villain named Murky Lurky have appeared on hundreds of products in 80 categories, including children's clothing, greeting cards, ready-to-eat cereal and toys.

She also has starred in 13 animated tv specials, a five-part tv miniseries and two feature-length movies. And she's made a special appearance in the form of a helium balloon at the 1985 Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade in New York. This girl has gotten around.

While an estimated $600 million has been made from the sale of Rainbow Brite-related products—toys accounted for $300 million in sales—executives at Hallmark Properties, the St. Louis-based licenser, anticipate her demise in 1988 at the ripe old age of 5.

"When a character is introduced, the possibilities for licensing are endless," says Jim McDowell, Hallmark Properties director-marketing services. "But three years is a long time to keep the spirit and the storyline of a fictional character fresh."

Children's short attention spans and the recent glut of licensed characters on the market keep even the most popular licensed characters in the spotlight usually for only one or two years. Mr. McDowell named only the Walt Disney, Looney Tunes and Peanuts characters as timeless personalities.

According to New York-based Toy Manufacturers of America, an average of three years and $2 million is spent developing a character whose life span is two years. The rewards are worth it, Mr. McDowell says.

For example, in 1983 Mattel Toys, Hawthorne, Cal., introduced Rainbow Brite dolls and accessories with $15 million of advertising support from Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles. The company more than recouped its investment. By the end of 1983, $110 million worth of units were sold, representing the best selling first-year product line in Mattel's history.

"Hallmark will undoubtedly introduce another character to the Rainbow Brite line next year, but nothing at this point will help to stir up awareness or sales," says Harvey Levin, vp-marketing/entertainment communications, Those Characters from Cleveland.

"A company can try to make a few more dollars introducing line extensions, but that's all they'll make," says Murray Altchuler, executive director, Licensing Industry Merchandisers Assn., New York. "The consumer—and specifically the child—is the final judge in determining if there's a value between the property and the product, not the licensee."

The end is in sight for Those Characters from Cleveland's line of Care Bears plush toys.

Rainbow Brite will live a long life—at least for a licensed character—thanks to home video movie sales, Mr. Altchuler says. Rainbow Brite is selling well in the paper goods and home video categories, Mr. Levin agrees, "but she's dead in the water as far as toy retailers are concerned."

Mr. Altchuler says, "Once a character's uniqueness has no value, get off the pot and create a new one!" While there are about 3,000 licensed characters in circulation today, only 75 of them are recognizable, he says. Next year, the same 75 characters probably will be replaced.

The glut in the licensing market is the direct result of too many licensers holding onto characters that are long past their prime, Mr. Levin says. TCFC's primary character properties—Care Bears, Herself the Elf, Holly Hobby, Sherman on the Mount and Strawberry Shortcake—are still alive in retail, although most have been around since the American Greetings subsidiary formed in 1981.

The company thrives on creating new characters to keep up with children's changing tastes. TCFC's newest creation —Popples, bear-like creatures that can be folded inside a pouch—has been licensed by 50 companies and will appear on everything from knapsacks to children's clothing. A plush toy version of Popples is being marketed by Mattel and supported with a $10 million ad campaign via Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles.

TCFC's Care Bears plush toys face a dim future, Mr. Levin says. The original line of pastel-colored cubs was introduced in 1981. Since then, several plush varieties by Kenner Products, Cincinnati, have been introduced successfully with $10 million in ad support from Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York. The Care Bears also have starred in two feature-length animated movies.

This success won't last, he says. "Longevity is not like it used to be," Mr. Levin says, adding he's surprised the plush line of Care Bears is still popular after five years. He attributes the license's success to the wholesome, timeless Care Bear storyline. "Characters like Care Bears, and I guess Rainbow Brite, too, have emotional appeal to little girls, boys and parents. They—or characters like them—will be popular long after the war toy craze is over."

Toy Manufacturers of America estimates 50% of licensed character sales can be attributed to toy versions of the product. "It isn't a surprise when a licensed character disappears one year after its toy counterpart has been pulled from the toy shelves," says Thomas Murn, editorial director, Licensing Today, New York.

"For every character introduced each year, one character should be eliminated," Mr. Murn suggests. That way, only those characters "in style" would be featured in stores and cartoons, he says.

A spokeswoman for Taft Productions, Cincinnati, the company that produces "Smurfs," disagrees. The company has had the top-rated children's animated program five years in a row even though the licensed toy products produced by the Applause division of San Diego-based Wallace Berrie Co. virtually disappeared after one year on the market.

"A toy's play value and the success of a cartoon based on that toy can't be compared," she says. "They appeal to children for different reasons."

Advertisers draw cartoons into endorsements

By Anita Busch

Happiness is a warm insurance policy—and a lucrative contract as an advertising spokescharacter. Snoopy, Charlie Brown, Garfield the Cat, Dennis the Menace and Cathy are only a few of the many cartoon characters that have found themselves taking on jobs that in the past were reserved for members of Actors Equity Assn.

> "... you know [characters] aren't going to embarrass the sponsor with such things as divorce."
> Jeff Brown
> Mark McCormack
> International Management

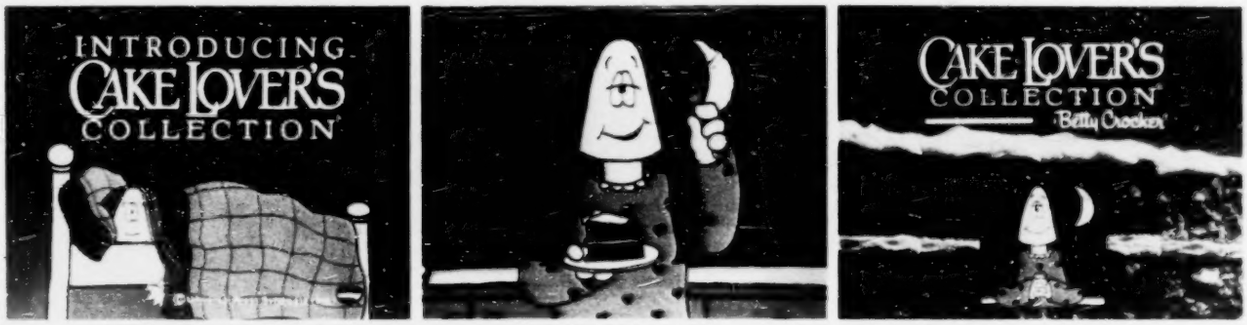
Licensed characters now endorse everything from insurance to cake. Licensing agents don't seem to worry about promoting their characters' advertising abilities because companies increasingly are approaching them to contract characters as product endorsers.

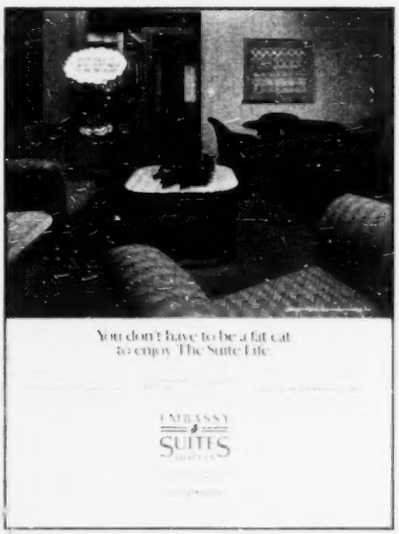


General Mills' Betty Crocker division hopes some of Cathy's widespread appeal will transfer to its new cake mixes.

Not only does this give the licensed character more exposure and increase the recall factor for the advertised product, but sales of other licensed products that bear the character's name usually are affected positively.

Jeff Brown, merchandising executive, New York-based Mark McCormack International Management Group, which handles licensing for Dennis the Menace, says his character's gig as a spokesperson has had a positive influence on sales of other Dennis-licensed products. The exposure also helps to license the blond menace in other product areas, he says.

"[Using Looney Tunes characters] gives ad support, creates more awareness of the product and more exposure for the characters," says Len Reiter, director-marketing, Licensing Corp. of America, which handles Looney Tunes characters. Sales of other Looney Tunes products also have been helped, he says, although declining to release exact figures.



Garfield was just what Embassy Suites needed. The animated cat loves to eat, sleep and rest.

"We see [this aspect of character licensing] as an area that has an opportunity for expansion," says Mike Georgopolis, senior vp-licensing for New York-based United Media Licensing.

The reasons are obvious. Marketers are finding these endorsers have established followings and wide appeal. They also work at a fraction of the cost of their human counterparts, and their egos are more difficult to bruise.

Costs could reach anywhere from $500,000 to $1 million per year when using a popular living spokesperson, says Roger Richman, president of Roger Richman Agency, Beverly Hills, Cal., which licenses the rights to such legends as Marilyn Monroe, W.C. Fields, Albert Einstein, Clark Gable and others. He cites the recent reported $15 million contract Pepsi-Cola USA offered Michael Jackson to represent its products.

The cost of using the licensed legends he represents ranges in the "low five figures per year," Mr. Richman says. None of the agents for the cartoon spokescharacters would provide their characters' salaries as endorsers.

It may be characters' emotional and social stability that makes them most appealing to advertisers. "The benefit in using [characters] is that you know they aren't going to embarrass the sponsor with such things as divorce or ... a drug problem. You also don't have to worry about them falling in and out of favor with the public," Mr. Brown says.

The risk is lower, agrees Mr. Georgopolis of United Media, which handles Peanuts characters and Garfield. "A cartoon is a known entity, the value is there—a proven value for a given entity."

Not every company that wants to use a certain character is granted permission, however. United Media Licensing is very particular about what product and company Garfield or Peanuts endorse, Mr. Georgopolis says. "We've had to turn companies away. We know what image we want to represent with the characters."

Garfield's image, a fat cat with an insatiable appetite for the good life, has universal appeal. Since his debut with his creator Jim Davis in American Express' "Do you know me?" campaign, the famous feline has been pursued by numerous companies that wish to employ his charm and dry wit. Garfield's latest campaign as spokescat for Embassy Suites, a Holiday Inn subsidiary, employs this uninhibited, unabashed sense of humor.

"We had been testing several different campaigns; we even considered using a spokesperson," says Judy Heinrich, director-communications, Embassy Suites, Irving, Tex. "Garfield tested real well with consumers. His character very much demands attention: He loves to eat, sleep and rest."

Being able to fulfill those needs at a low price is precisely the idea Embassy Suites wanted to convey in its ads, created by Stern/Monroe, Dallas, and tag lined "You don't have to be a fat cat to enjoy The Suite Life." Garfield lounges in one of Embassy's suites and later sits down to a huge, free, cooked-to-order breakfast. With a broad grin and yawning eyes, the pampered cat's personality surfaces as he sighs, "Let's face it, I was destined to be spoiled."

Cartoons drawn into endorsements

ance Co., New York, Peanuts characters provide integrity and recognition. "Wholesomeness, integrity, family security and longevity can be represented through Peanuts characters," Mr. Georgopolis says. "Insurance companies have had a hard time finding a memorable graphic appeal. Peanuts provides this."

Met Life has been employing Peanuts characters since January, 1985. After trying numerous campaigns, Met Life chose Peanuts in an effort to establish an image as an innovative insurance company.

"After a fair amount of research, we decided on using the Peanuts characters," says Bob Weinstein, assistant vp-advertising. "The key thing in using Peanuts is that it separates us from the others in our industry. We were able to break through the ad clutter and make us look innovative in the conservative insurance industry."

Minneapolis-based General Mills' Betty Crocker division selected Cathy to promote the Cake Lover's Collection, a new premium layer cake mix.

Some of the criteria for the Cake Lover's spokesperson was that he or she be well known and have widespread appeal. Cathy filled the recipe, being syndicated in 500 newspapers that reach 50 million readers nationwide.

"[Cathy] has an established following and a consistent track record," according to Tom Drape, New York-based Universal Licensing, which handles Cathy. "She provides humor and warmth, broad appeal and attracts a younger audience."

Cathy Guisewite, who created Cathy in 1977, has been very involved in all aspects of her character's licensing. She is very active in advertising, marketing and promoting Cathy as are cartoonists Charles Schulz, Jim Davis and Hank Ketcham, the man behind Dennis the Menace. The creators retain final approval over licensing projects.

Fast food franchises also have realized the benefits of using licensed cartoon characters as spokespeople. For instance, Atlanta-based Arby's has been using United Media Licensing's Mr. Men & Little Miss since June, 1984. Mr. Men & Little Miss "is the longest running, intellectual ad for a restaurant of this type," Mr. Georgopolis says.

Arby's features these characters in ads and on meal boxes packaged for children. Called Arby's Adventure Meal, the box might have a crossword on one side and fun facts on the other.

"There is an element of education. Through their whimsical quality of human nature they teach children," says Sherri Shapiro, Arby's manager-marketing communications. "These characters appeal to children, but because it has a moral base, adults and parents like it too." The characters are extremely popular with teachers and are used as an educational aid, she says.

Dennis the Menace has been plugging Dairy Queen restaurants since the summer of 1971. As the No. 1 syndicated cartoon panel, according to Mark McCormack's Mr. Brown, the mischievous towhead has the apparently universally desired qualities of high recognition and unlimited age appeal.

Dennis is perceived as an all-American 5-year-old, he says. "It's easy to relate to someone in Dennis' world." He's been used mainly for family-oriented products like Rydelle Laboratories' Rhuli antiseptic cream; the American Dairy Assn.; Michigan Apple Growers Assn., and Encyclopaedia Britannica to name a few.

General Mills will use the overall-clad menace on 20 million boxes of Cheerios cereal beginning in the fourth quarter of this year, according to Chris Halwell, director, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample program exchange, the agency's syndication arm. This will follow an animated series starring Dennis that is set to debut Sept. 27.

General Mills "was searching for a well-known, nonviolent, nontrendy character that was not yet used by a toy company," Mr. Brown says. Dennis the Menace was the perfect choice.

This year the Trix rabbit will meet up with the hare-brained wit of Bugs Bunny in commercials. Bugs isn't the only Looney Tunes character to be used in ads. Bristol-Myers' Renuzit and McDonald's Corp.—for its McDLT—have adopted Pepe LePew as a spokesperson. Six Flags Corp., MTV: Music Television and Coca-Cola Co. all have used Looney Tunes animated characters to identify their services or products, and the Roadrunner can be seen in Hershey's "One of the all-time greats" commercial.

Although Mr. Richman is the man responsible for licensing the characters for the Hershey's commercial, he knows as well as anyone that licensed spokescharacters do not have to be illustrated creations.

His Hollywood legend properties currently appear in 14 different ad campaigns. Maxell videotapes recently signed a three-year contract for the rights to use the image of Marilyn Monroe in a Scali, McCabe, Sloves-created print campaign that will break in July.

Advertisers are using these famous faces for the recognition factor and to translate the star's personality to the company's image. "The stars are licensing legends that live forever," he says. "The recall is tremendous."

Their pen-and-ink counterparts possess the same pulling power. "Since we introduced the Garfield campaign, [toll-free number] call volume has increased over 58% from 1985, and this is directly attributed to Garfield," Embassy's Ms. Heinrich says.

Metropolitan Life performs an annual survey that tests slogan, ad and message recall and ad awareness. "They all had significant increases since the Peanuts campaign was introduced in January of '85," Mr. Weinstein says.

With performance like this, and barring any sudden submission to drug addiction by Charlie Brown and the gang, these and other animated characters will continue to find advertising a rewarding outlet for their talents.

Lots of life in Hollywood legends

Marilyn Monroe would have turned 60 June 1. With the birthday commemoration came a flood of Marilyn memorabilia—and a deluge of business opportunities.

Roger Richman, president of the Roger Richman Agency, Beverly Hills, Cal., which represents the legendary sex symbol, says many ad agencies have contracted Ms. Monroe's image to push their products. Coca-Cola Co., Eastern Air Lines, Hershey Foods, Maxell Corp. of America and Max Factor & Co. are using Ms. Monroe's likeness in ads for at least one of their brands.

In addition, Limited Express, a 200-store unit of Columbus, O.-based Limited Inc., will introduce 23 Marilyn Monroe accessory items July 1. The Limited promotion "should establish Marilyn Monroe as a fashion trendsetter," Mr. Richman says.

In addition, the Richman Agency has apparel licenses with New York-based Butterick Co. for dress patterns and Dector Mannequins, Los Angeles, which manufactures Marilyn Monroe look-alike mannequins. In May J.C. Penney Co. began a six-month Marilyn-style promotion in 1,800 stores.

The trend of using Hollywood legends to push products is accelerating, Mr. Richman says. Because they are legends, he says, their marketable life spans are endless, creating enviable recognition and recall value.

Since the California Celebrity Rights Law went into effect in January, 1985, more marketers are turning to these old stars for advertising, he says. Mr. Richman, who is known as the father of the law, says it guarantees advertisers exclusivity, prohibits the unauthorized use of licensed legends and clarifies the previously vague legal statute. The previous law had been around 14 years and did not include protection of both current and past celebrities' voices, signatures and photographs.

Spokescritters speak up from retail shelves

By Julie Franz

Ralston Purina's activity in creating cereal concepts can be characterized quite easily: Buy, buy, buy, buy, buy, buy.

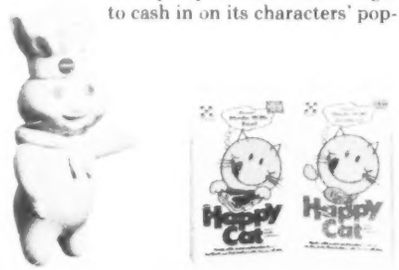
In rapid succession, the company bought the rights to Cracker Jack, Sun Maid, Cabbage Patch Kids, Rainbow Brite, G.I. Joe Action Stars and Ghostbusters, creating ready-to-eat or instant hot cereals based on those licensed concepts. With the St. Louis-based company poised to begin testing a product called Nerds, based on a newly created licensed character, it is easy to see licensed cereal products have become a stalwart in Ralston Purina's competitive battle with market-leading Kellogg and General Mills.

Recently Ralston took a different tack by selling the rights to its Purina Happy Cat cat food logo. In March Ralston hired Joan Hansen & Co., a New York-based licensing agency, to help the company strike deals with licensees interested in the happy-faced kitty.

Ralston joins a host of other food and consumer product companies that have begun selling their logos or corporate spokescritters to gain exposure. While the phenomenon isn't new, it is accelerating as consumer product concerns become more aware of corporate licensing. Happy Cat joins the likes of Pillsbury's Pop 'n Fresh Doughboy, Quaker Oats Co.'s Cap'n Crunch, Hershey Foods' Kisses, Lever Bros.' Snuggle Bear, Campbell Soup Co.'s Campbell Kids and Kellogg's Tony the Tiger.

These food and consumer product companies did not start with a licensed concept and then create products around them. They began with corporate or brand logos and spokescritters and suddenly discovered they had much more on their hands than a label graphic or a cute character for advertising purposes.

Kellogg began its corporate licensing program in the early 1980s, responding to consumer demand for products with Tony the Tiger, Toucan Sam and Snap, Crackle & Pop, all Kellogg product spokescritters. The company also was looking for a source of special gifts for shareholders and feeling the pressure from prospective licensees eager to cash in on its characters' popularity, a company spokesman says.



Pillsbury's Dough Boy, Ralston Purina's Happy Cat and Lever Bros.' Snuggle are turning up on consumer products.

A few years later, consumers now can buy pencil boxes, lunch pails, mugs, dish towels and various other items brightly emblazoned with Kellogg trademarks.

New York-based Lever Bros. is working on a contract to license its Snuggle Bear, the squeaky-voiced teddy that represents Snuggle fabric softener.

The logic behind the licensing is not uncommon: Protect the legal trademark. Beyond that, every Snuggle Bear that makes its way off the tv set and product package and into kids' toy boxes compounds the number of consumer impressions for the product and generates additional revenue.

Experts differ on whether corporate licensing is lucrative. While most corporations seem to minimize the importance of the additional income, licensing consultants are quick to point out the "purity" of licensed products' income stream.

The rule of thumb in licensing agreements is that 6% of every $1 million in licensed product sales goes to the licenser as well as an initial fee for the use of the license, says Joan Hansen, president of Joan Hansen & Co.

Return on investment can be higher, says Glen Konkle, president, Equity Management Inc., Palatine, Ill. EMI helped Quaker Oats create licensing opportunities for its Cap'n Crunch character. Returns can run as high as 400% to 500% after the first year and rise to 10,000% thereafter, he says, because corporations already have developed their logo or spokescritter and have built a strong brand franchise, something products created specifically for licensing have to spend money doing.

Expanding into unfamiliar product segments is another benefit of corporate licensing, says Milton Schulman, editor, The Licensing Book, a New York-based trade publication.

Happy Cat products will spread the whiskered yellow smiling face onto pet toys by year's end. Children's apparel, t-shirts and sportswear also are possibilities, Ms. Hansen says. The pet toys will be sold through pet stores, an outlet Purina doesn't use to sell its pet foods. Distribution there will expose the Purina Happy Cat name to consumers who ordinarily would not see it in that retail environment, she says.

Licensing also has its pitfalls, most often failing because the products are ill-conceived, says Seth Siegel, vp, Hamilton Projects, a New York-based licensing consulting company. "You can't stick a trademark name on products that look like premiums," he says.

Companies contemplating licensing ventures have to patiently stick to their initial strategies, Mr. Siegel says. Most efforts flop because too many different products featuring the spokescritters hit the market at once without a logical plan of introduction. Consequently, the consumer becomes overwhelmed, he says.

Although he won't identify them, EMI's Mr. Konkle says two projects involving the licensing of spokescritters never saw the light of day because both were viewed by consumers as "obvious exploitations. There were just no logical links in consumers' minds between the main brands and other products," he says.

EMI uses a research-based approach to licensed product development. The company uses groups, measuring the strength of a brand's image through psychological testing with individual consumers.

Corporations face the nightmare of a failed licensing program causing a backlash for the main brand, one expert says. "Consumers can become cynical or antagonistic about a licensed product, therefore lowering the image of the main brand." Luckily, he says, the market has not seen such a case.

Corporate-licensed logos and spokescritters face tremendous competition from products created for the sole purpose of licensing, like Hallmark Cards' Rainbow Brite, one industry expert says.

"Those companies hit the market with huge amounts of promotional dollars. If a corporate-licensed product isn't up to quality standards or isn't backed with enough bucks, who's going to buy it? Consumers won't buy junk and retailers prefer to stock a phenomenon like Strawberry Shortcake rather than a sub-par Keebler Elf doll, for example," the source says.

Spokescritters also fight an uphill battle with parents, another industry source says. "Those characters may be juvenile oriented, but the purchase is parent powered. Research shows that parents are resistant to bringing a character into their homes that's a spokescritter," the source says. "Parents have been trained to see licensed items with spokescritters as closeout sales on back-of-the-cereal box premiums."

Marian Garrison, manager-special projects for Camden, N.J.-based Campbell Soup Co., disagrees. In Campbell's case, so many parents grew up with the Campbell Kids, she says, they welcome licensed products that carry the Twins' image as momentos of their childhood. Collectors scramble for limited edition licensed items for some

Putting muscle into trademark protection

By Don Veraska

A corporation's trademarks and logos are valuable commodities. This value promoted even typically long-winded law makers to distill their thoughts into a coherent statement on the subject.

A Senate Judiciary Committee report on the Trademark Counterfeiting Act of 1984—created in part to correct inadequacies in the level of protection provided to corporations via the Lanham Act—put it clearly: For consumers, trademarks represent "a uniquely reliable source of information about potential purchases. For manufacturers, trademarks crystalize the reputation that they built up in the past and ensure that satisfied customers will know where to come back for more."

The dollar value of the reputation represented by a logo often is difficult to determine. But any company that exchanges its emblem for royalties on licensed goods sales quickly begins to tally in black and white the value of its corporate and brand symbols.

While trademarks are valuable, they also are fragile entities. By themselves, trademarks essentially are useless.

"All the little trademark TM designation says on a product is that I am claiming this as a trademark, that I am making an ownership claim to this name," says Seth Siegel, a lawyer and vp with licensing agency Hamilton Projects, New York. "The issue is not who registers a trademark first, but who uses it first. That use gives you a superior mark; it allows you to register it for a specific use."

A company or product with a well-known trademark—a Jack Daniel's whisky or a Harley-Davidson Motor Co.—has two means of protecting and reinforcing its trademarks. It may license that trademark for use in various products, then register its use in that category with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. This procedure protects against unauthorized use of the trademark in the product category and further establishes the basic corporate trademark. It also can be a corporate money maker.

Companies also can be diligent in guarding against illegal trademark use when it occurs, which means monitoring the marketplace and taking civil or criminal action when the companies encounter illegally trademarked goods. Failure to protect corporate logos against illegal use theoretically can result in the loss of the trademark.

The potential to lose revenue unfortunately is very real. Arnold Bolka, publisher of "The Licensing Letter," a Scottsdale, Ariz.-based licensing newsletter, estimates companies are losing about $20 billion annually from unauthorized copyright infringement. He labels this the industry's No. 1 problem.

Despite the $20 billion loss, companies appear to be doing little to improve the situation and enlarge their coffers. "Given that licensing involves two of the corporation's most sacred assets—its name and image—it is shocking that so little effort is committed by many corporations to the issues of control and license management," says Weston Anson, president, Marketing/Trademark Consultants, La Jolla, Cal.

Using an educational campaign, such as this from Mattel Inc., is one way to fight counterfeiters.

Corporate licensers have been lax in monitoring even their legal licensing arrangements, says Edward Albert, president, Licensing Management Group, New York. "Most companies just don't know what licensing is about. Somebody convinces them it's easy, but the companies aren't prepared to administer it."

When a company launches a licensing program, the licensees typically "do whatever they want to do," he says. "Licensees, after all, are independent entrepreneurs, used to running their own businesses. So you get a rough period. Maybe a year into their licensing business, the licenser has to catch up, to establish rules, to try to track the licensed products. They don't understand the significance of licensing until there's a problem."

The problems primarily arise from companies' failures to monitor licensees, he says. The results of this laissez faire posture are inferior products and marketing procedures or advertising practices that hurt the licenser's image, trademark and brands' marketplace performance.

It is rare when either the licenser or a licensing agency runs a licensing business adequately, Mr. Albert says, "as a tight ship, using the licensee to improve his business."

Hamilton Projects' Mr. Siegel disagrees, saying few companies have problems with the licensing business, particularly if that business is handled by a reputable licensing agent. It's all a matter of procedure, he says.

"You start with the licensing agreement, making sure by the contract that the licensee acknowledges your exclusive right to your trademarks, that they won't challenge your ownership of the mark," Mr. Siegel says. "You carefully supervise the creation of products, making sure the licensee is complying with the contractual obligations involving the creation, distribution and sale of the products and using appropriate trademark notices. Which is to say that they are exercising the use of your property in the correct manner."

The contract between licenser and licensee, he says, is the starting point, "a good road map that spells out the obligations of the licensee." The licenser or his Minneapolis-based Pillsbury takes its own approach to protecting its equity in the Pop 'n Fresh Doughboy.

While several products with the Doughboy and Pillsbury's Best logos are on the market, Pillsbury put them there—not any licensee.

"We don't license our trademarks. We never have and we never will," a Pillsbury spokesman says. "We don't want to lose control over [the trademarks] or their image."

Pillsbury has been approached by prospective licensees on numerous items, but has never taken them up on their offers. Staples traditionally do not command strong brand loyalty, which is essential in licensing-related products. Pillsbury's primary products are staple items, like flour, he says, and "Who's to say that's [General Mills'] Gold Medal flour or ours in a canister bearing our name," he says.

Handling its own licensing gives Pillsbury more control over the number of items on the market. When the company oversees each item's production and distribution, it knows quickly when copyrights are being pirated, the spokesman says, rather than have to rely on its licensees to police the market.

The company also can control more effectively the marketing of the licensed items. "Marketing people usually want to make it a whiz-bang promotion to sell the product," he says. "But if they go too far and offend the public's sensibilities, that reflects on the brand franchise whose income is infinitely more valuable than that of the licensed product."

Companies seeking licenses cannot convince Pillsbury that licensed products will affect the main brand's sales. "I ask them, 'If I let you use the Pillsbury's Best on a flour canister, how much will it affect my sales?' They can't even tell you if sales will be up, down or a washout," the spokesman says.

Statistics reporting the long-term impact of a licensed item are not available, he says. "Does it last two days, two weeks or until the [competitor's] next coupon comes out?"

Pillsbury also is concerned about the risks involved in licensing. Should a licensee fill a Doughboy cookie jar with tainted product or a child swallow the button that made the Doughboy's eye, the consequences could be monumental, the spokesman says.

Consultants continue to stress that licensing plans must be undertaken with care, considering existing marketing trends. "If a product ends up looking like a premium offer, I flatly predict it will fail," Hamilton Project's Mr. Siegel says.

But with companies always willing to walk new revenue avenues and corporate licensing's continued role in building brand identity and loyalty, more companies will continue to see if they can squeeze more dollars out of their doughboys and other agent, Mr. Siegel says, should inspect and approve the use of anything having to do with the licensed product, press releases, advertising, packaging and even the product hang tags.

The Licensing Management Group has developed a system of 14 computer programs designed to help licensers monitor all aspects of their licensing program. "Right now," Mr. Albert says, "the major licensing agencies are only mechanized to the point of collecting royalties. Our computer programs are geared to ensure that licensers understand all aspects of the business—product approval, royalties, sales and advertising."

The computerization eliminates the need for a large staff to police a licensing program, he says. In addition, illegal or unapproved trademark usage in court is easier to substantiate through the computerized records.

Both Mr. Siegel and Milton Schulman, editor of The Licensing Book, New York, argue that illegal trademark use is more of a problem than is inadequately policed legal licensing.

"Legal licensing use is usually a very carefully controlled area because a trademark is such a valuable product to protect," Mr. Schulman says. "Where there are problems is in the illegal knockoffs—product areas where things can be gotten out quickly, inexpensively, like paper-product items and t-shirts."

The counterfeit problem is very sophisticated, Mr. Siegel says, involving not only "multimillion-dollar criminal organizations engaged in systematic counterfeiting operations, but the fly-by-nighters who use a silk-screen press in their garage and sell t-shirts from pickup trucks at campgrounds."

A licenser can protect its trademark against illegal use in a variety of ways, Mr. Siegel says. "The most important is to run an educational campaign, which we do for our clients, with warning notices and trademark notifications in appropriate magazines and publications." Second, he says, notify the U.S. Customs Service about clients' licensing programs, keeping them informed about the possibility of foreign-produced illegally trademarked goods. Finally, licensing agents and licensers should educate retailers to buy only authorized licensed products.

Typically retailers that unknowingly buy illegally licensed goods only will be asked to pull the bogus products off the shelves. A few years ago Hamilton Projects discovered a major retailer was innocently selling thousands of "Where's the Beef?" t-shirts that were not licensed by Wendy's International. "We notified the retailer and the products were pulled. Word spread in the retailing industry, and retailers started calling us to make sure that so-and-so was an authorized source of licensed goods."

Two companies that have taken different approaches toward licensing their trademarks are Harley-Davidson Motor Co. and Jack Daniel Distillery, although both have had their problems with illegal trademark ripoffs.

Allen Hovious, director-marketing coordination and communications at Jack Daniel, Lynchburg, Tenn., says while illegal products with the company's trademark are still found, the problem's severity has declined. For some 15 years, Jack Daniel has contracted with outside companies to produce branded products and has sold them at the company-owned Lynchburg Hardware & General Store and through The Company Store, a California wholesaler. No licensing was involved in these operations.

Jack Daniel's first major licensing operation began this spring with the marketing of grilling charcoal by a Tennessee company. The charcoal will carry the Jack Daniel's name, but not its familiar whisky bottle logo.

Mr. Hovious says Jack Daniel seldom has found it necessary to take legal action against legitimate retailers found selling unlicensed Jack Daniel's products. "Mostly, it's just a case of cease-and-desist letters to the retailers," he says.

Harley-Davidson's licensing enforcement program is more aggressive. The company has contracted with 40 licensees to produce products ranging from sportswear to school supplies to gold jewelry.

"We've been in this some three years," says John A. Heiman, manager-trademark licensing at the Milwaukee.-based company. "We became aware four or five years ago that we were being knocked off."

Harley-Davidson maintains a strong internal police force to guard against unlicensed products. "But our biggest police force are the sales marketing branches of our licensees," he says.

"Our intent is not to put people out of business but to uphold our trademark."

Harley, Mr. Heiman says, has not taken criminal action against counterfeiters, but has filed dozens of civil actions to get illegal products off the market. Kansas City, Mo.-based Hallmark Cards has been diligent in protecting its licensed trademark.

Special events may be a hot flash in the pan

By Joanne Y. Cleaver

Not all observers of Halley's comet cast their eyes toward the heavens. Some set their sights a bit closer to earth, eyeballing wallets and focusing on the excitement generated by the celestial snowball's visit and the licensing opportunities it created.

Joanne Y. Cleaver, a frequent contributor to Special Report, wrote the overview for last year's Licensing Special Report.

But marketers don't have to wait 75 years to take advantage of a one-time event. Special events—even man-made ones—offer licensing opportunities.

Many rules of thumb for being linked to one-time happenings run contrary to traditional licensing wisdom, however. As one-shot deals, the ability to merchandise them is tightened by time constraints.

Limited also by geographic location, the manpower and investment required often cannot be justified by the potential returns, one source says. For this reason he suggests licensers become involved in only large-scale events in major cities, or those that transcend metro boundaries such as the Statue of Liberty restoration.

The process of generating momentum for the properties also often cannot be controlled by the licensee or the licenser.

Still, special events offer a chance for companies to ride the swell of public interest events create. "Events have extremely high exposure and high emotional appeal," says Michael Stone, president of Hamilton Projects, New York. "Sponsors and licensees can take advantage of it to promote their products. There are lots of ways to associate a product with an event—advertising, point-of-purchase, packaging."

Tight planning is crucial. In other licensing situations, demand for the product is spurred by marketing until it runs its course. Events have shorter, more defined life cycles.

Many special events have specific licensers; regular sponsors of an event have a natural jumping off point for merchandising, says Michael Chesler, merchandising executive with Cleveland-based International Management Group.

For example, the All England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club began to capitalize on interest in the Wimbledon Tennis Championship five years ago. In the U.S., tennis clothing and accessories, tagged with an official Wimbledon logo, sold well enough that a line of casual wear was added.

Everything from cosmetics to leather goods bearing the Wimbledon logo sells briskly year-round in Japan, Mr. Chesler says. The "Flying W" logo was created for merchandising the tournament's image, and licensees are on every continent but South America.

"Inherent in the name and event is a certain imagery that consumers like to be associated with," Mr. Chesler says.

The ownership of promotional rights to other happenings may be fuzzier, especially when the event is in the public domain. For example, at least three separate licensing campaigns have been created around the October America's Cup yacht race, and each is as legal and legitimate as the other.

Special events, such as the return of Halley's Comet, offer licensing opportunities.

In such cases, participating licensees actually are buying the licenser's interpretation of the public domain event—not exclusive rights to be linked to the event. "There will be some overlap in merchandising," says Len Mizerek, president of New York-based Mizerek Inc., a licensing agency that created a "Spirit of America" program to capitalize on the America's Cup race. "But the markets are big enough," he says.

Mr. Mizerek says his licensees need to establish their lines quickly in distribution channels to avoid competition from other America's Cup logos.

The Statue of Liberty also is in the public domain, but the logo for the "Keep the Torch Lit" license was created by Hamilton Projects. Mr. Stone says he first lined up a handful of well-known corporate spon-

The company ran ads in trade publications late last year noting its ownership of the Rainbow Brite character, used both in greeting cards and licensed to Mattel to produce dolls. "Running ads is a common thing for a company to do when they develop a popular product like Rainbow Brite," a Hallmark spokesman says. "We hope to avoid litigation."

The company couldn't sidestep other litigation, when it was forced to defend itself in a federal court suit in March. The complaint, which Hallmark won, was filed by a Missouri woman who claimed Rainbow Brite closely resembled a character she had developed.

Hallmark also won a federal court infringement suit against a Kansas City automobile dealership named Hallmark Dodge. It also has brought action against a New York-based card and novelty marketer that uses the slogan "When you could care less about having the best," which Hallmark argues is a ripoff of its "When you care enough to send the very best" slogan.

sors—in exchange for exclusive licensing rights granted by the official nonprofit organization spearheading the restoration—to raise enough seed money to help finance the rest of the $250 million needed for the statue.

Now, at the height of the campaign, more than 90 licensees are using the official logo. Many other manufacturers are producing Lady Liberty products, he says, but only those with his license are donating part of their proceeds to the restoration—a fact put on product hangtags.

Running into others who came up with the same basic idea is just one of the pitfalls of public domain special events licensing. Other unforeseen and unpreventable factors can damage merchandising plans.

Mr. Mizerek's agency created a whimsical comet logo for Halley's Comet memorabilia. After an initial spurt of publicity at the beginnning of the year of the comet, public interest fizzled. To best view the comet, watchers had to travel to South America where it appeared as a blurry streak, Mr. Mizerek says.

Already facing apathy, merchandisers' hopes for a publicity push exploded with the space shuttle Challenger disaster. The shuttle was supposed to launch a satellite to take closeup pictures of the comet, and licensees were counting on a blitz of news coverage to boost sales.

Mr. Mizerek says some licensees were left with overstocks of merchandise. Some of these, he says, are trying to get rid of surplus using the slogan, "You didn't see the comet then, but you can see it now." Other licensees are trying to sell their goods in countries where the comet was more visible.

"I wish it was brighter," Mr. Mizerek says. "1910 was great." AA ken into two distinct types. Brand extension licensing is when a licensed product carries a brand into product categories of which it typically is not a part, say Arnold Bolka, publisher, "The Licensing Letter," Scottsdale, Ariz., and Glen Konkle, president, Equity Management Inc., Palatine, Ill.

"Brand awareness is perceived on the consumer end," Mr. Bolka says. "I don't think it's a licensing technique per se, it's just the desired end to exposure of a brand." Mr. Konkle agrees, saying it is simply "the output of having a name on a product."

Another opinion muddies the waters and shows that corporate licensing basically still runs an uncharted course with lots of eddies in its current of thought—although it reportedly started in 1904 with the licensing of Buster Brown.

Milton Schulman, editor of The Licensing Book, New York, sides with Ms. Bailey that two categories of corporate licensing exist. "Brand extension is when a full line of products are created; brand awareness licensing involves giving the right to one manufacturer to use your name on a specific item," he says.

Englewood, N.J.-based Popsicle Industries and Parsippany, N.J.-based Nabisco Brands' Oreo Cookies'n Cream program is the textbook example cited by licensing agents as a classically effective use of licensing to extend brands.

In the same breath they mention the marriage of Coca-Cola Co., Atlanta, and Murjani International, New York, which came out with a line of apparel under the Coke name.

"It's a way for a corporation to create a cost-effective way to develop new products," Ms. Bailey says.

"There's no research and development, no marketing, sales or production costs. The corporation doesn't make the total profit, of course, but it's a very nice revenue producer without the upfront commitment and risk."

The growth of this licensing segment is very dramatic, especially in terms of companies that want to look to corporate licensing as part of their over-all marketing and advertising mix, she says. The reason for the boom is apparent. "A corporation isn't going to make a lot of money with brand awareness licensing, but it can make some nice royalty fees out of brand extension," Ms. Bailey says.

Others look at corporate licensing's role in terms of overall marketing strategy. "Corporate licensing is the ultimate leveraged marketing strategy," says Mr. Anson, who liked this phrase so much he had it registered as a trademark. "Simply, it is the process of extracting more benefits from a strategy than the investment required," he says, estimating about 1,000 trademarks are being licensed in one or more consumer product areas.

Although estimates vary, Mr. Anson says, corporate licensing accounts for 15% of the total licensing market and has an annual growth rate of more than 20%.

A cool $14 billion in royalties was deposited in the pockets of corporate licensers last year, Mr.

Steve Musgrave

Bolka says.

That amount represented 28% of the $50.1 billion in 1985 licensed product retail sales and pegged corporate licensing as the largest and fastest growing segment of all categories in the field.

To stress corporate licensing's clout, cartoon character licensing came in second with $12 billion or 24% of total licensed retail sales; sports licensing accounted for 11% of licensing sales with $5.5 billion, putting it in a distant third place.

The Licensing Industry Merchandisers' Assn., however, says corporate licensing market share estimates of more than 15% are too high, although it does not offer any estimate.

A corporate licenser with a successful licensed product might expect anywhere from 2% to 10% of the royalties on wholesale sales. The average royalty is about 4%, according to a study Mr. Anson conducted of 17 licenser companies. The average earnings on these companies' licensing efforts ran from $4 million to $6 million annually, he says.

There's always been money to make in corporate licensing, but the movement is getting more publicity now, Mr. Bolka says.

In addition to the obvious opportunity to make money, corporate licensing is receiving more attention because it is perhaps the most flexible form of licensing. "Character licensing appeals only to a juvenile crowd," The Licensing Book's Mr. Schulman says. "Corporate licensing can bring into play other departments in a mass merchandise store," he says, while character licensing is concentrated in toy departments.

Increased corporate demand for information about the viability of licensing names or symbols has led Marketing Evaluations, a Port Washington, N.Y.-based market research company, to create a new division called Product Q, says Steven Levitt, president.

"We basically measure the popularity of brand names so we can tell a corporation how many consumers are familiar with the name and what appeal the brand has," he says. The company asks some 3,500 consumers to determine whether they know a product name, like the product and like it more than competitors' brands.

"A company that has this information can sit back and know if its symbol or brand has magic to it," Mr. Levitt says. "And they'll know if it's a good choice to license the brand to those other manufacturers."

Succeeding in corporate licensing depends not only on how well a company's name is known and liked by the general public, but also on the appropriateness of the relationship between the licensed product and the corporate name.

"Just as in the casting of tv commercials, a choice can be disastrous," Mr. Levitt says. "If the product doesn't have a reason for being, it won't work. Look at the choice of John Houseman for the Smith Barney commercials. It worked great. But then Houseman was cast for a McDonald's commercial selling hamburgers . . . and it just didn't work."

Some corporations have learned their lesson the hard way, Mr. Schulman says. "Last year it seemed like corporations were granting licenses across the board.

The results were a lot of products that looked like premium promotions." Companies' licensing arrangements recently have become more sophisticated and targeted, he says.

Although he says companies probably were too free in contracting licensees last year, Mr.

Schulman says no formula exists to determine the right amount. "That's impossible to answer. But a corporation does need a variety of product categories and not just one or two licensees." Because each corporation incorporates different goals into its licensing program, the number and types of licensees considered will differ as well.

The really important thing is to have a name with consumer awareness and acceptance, Mr. Schulman says. "And, of course, the new products developed should have a realistic relationship with the corporate name."

People involved in corporate licensing also are having a hard time convincing retailers of the advantages of shelving corporate vs. fad—mainly character-oriented—merchandise, he says. "The volume of corporate products is much lower than fad, but it's more steady and ongoing," Mr. Schulman says.

The astounding proliferation of character items and the competition for shelf space has made retailers wary. "The retailer reacts by asking, 'Do I really need this?'" says Michael Sisson, president, Sisson Associates, a New York-based licensing agency. "For the corporate items, it's a more long-term commitment and many [retailers] aren't willing to commit to it."

Because corporate products will not produce a high yield quickly, Mr. Schulman suggests they share retailer space, perhaps by forming corporate boutiques. "It could cover various product categories and be set up in a designated area of a store. But the idea needs to get the backing of retailers and it's just in the talking stages," he says.

Some progress already has been made by individual corporate lines in establishing a strong retail presence. Philadelphia-based J.G. Hook and Murjani, for example, have set up specialized boutiques and retail outlets for Walt Disney Productions and Coca-Cola licensed products, respectively.

In addition to the shelf space problem, corporate licensing is plagued by copyright infringements. This illegal activity siphons about $20 billion a year off licensing profits, estimates "The Licensing Letter's" Mr. Bolka.

"It is the No. 1 problem in the industry, but unfortunately there is no industrywide program mounted to attack it yet," he says. "The larger companies have the wherewithal to police their own property, but many smaller companies don't."

Toys, apparel, luggage, jewelry and cosmetics are all fair game for counterfeiters, sources say.

Steve Musgrave

"It's less of a problem now than it was two years ago," Mr. Anson says, because of increased policing by licensers and more education and awareness of the problem. The risk isn't what it was, Ms. Bailey agrees. Not too long ago many corporations feared getting into corporate licensing because of the problems associated with monitoring the company trademark.

"As long as a corporation and its licensee work with a reputable agent, you can be sure you'll get a good reflection of the corporation," she says. But just as properly conceived licensing arrangements can reflect handsomely on a company, a poorly executed job can hurt the company's image, Ms. Bailey says.

But the stakes are as high—or higher—for the licensee manufacturer as they are for the corporate licenser. "If a new product fails, it's not going to surface to that large of a degree for the consumer to be aware of. The corporation's not going to feel any backlash, but the licensee will," Mr. Sisson says. "The licensee has an investment in product and inventory. He's made a commitment to a new product, so he's the one that can lose."

Enough companies on both sides of the licensing contract have become interested in corporate licensing to stimulate further, significant growth, however. Consumers always will like brand names, industry observers say. "I believe corporate licensing has the greatest growth potential among all the categories in licensing," Ms. Bailey says.

But the boom times may be slow in developing. Companies will move very cautiously into corporate licensing, Mr. Schulman says.

"Their name is at stake and no company wants to adversely affect the value of their trademark," he says, especially in today's competitive licensing environment, where a name is much more than just a name.

Planning should precede corporate plunge

Corporations can learn a lesson from the tortoise and the hare. When it comes to making a go of it in corporate licensing, slow and steady is the way to run the course, the experts say.

For starters, companies must determine consumer awareness of their brands or trademarks. Market research companies can help garner the numbers. "You need to have facts and figures on how consumers relate to the logo or brand," says Michael Sisson, president of Sisson Associates in New York.

Not only does a company need good marks on consumer awareness, but it also will need to exactly define its potential audience, says Weston Anson, president of Marketing/Trademark Consultants in La Jolla, Cal. "It's not so much how many, but who, and how broad is that group?" he says.

But even a product with high consumer awareness isn't guaranteed success. The company or brand name has to ring well in the ears of the consumer, Mr. Anson says.

"I would bet that Brillo, for example, has a high awareness factor among consumers," he says. "But it's not an attractive name. It indicates grit and dirt to a lot of people. So then you have to ask yourself, where can you go with that? What product categories make sense?" The nature of some products simply limits their licensing potential, he says.

Start with common sense. British Airways may have a gold mine in a line of licensed luggage or apparel for traveling, Mr. Sisson says. But it would be useless to slap the airline name on tea biscuits, for instance, because there's not enough of a link between the company and the product, he says. "Of course, tea biscuits could be right if the airline served them to passengers and found it had a following that way."

A company that can be represented in a very specific item or image, such as Harley-Davidson Motor Co., often has a future in corporate licensing, says Nancy Bailey of Nancy Bailey & Associates in Miami. Category-leading products have strong licensing potential, as do life-style brands or an old company that hooks into nostalgia or history, she says.

Possessing the best market share won't guarantee success, however. "A corporation has to evaluate all the factors because there's so much competition in corporate licensing," Ms. Bailey says. "Everyone wants to get in."

Corporations interested in licensing should determine where they are missing product opportunities and whether corporate licensing can help to fill the gaps, Mr. Anson says. Look at the dark side of the deal as well. tive effects on the company's image and balancing those against the potential payoff.

A company also should look at its willingness to accept another company manufacturing a product with the licenser's name on it, says Glen Konkle, president, Equity Management Inc., a Palatine, Ill.-based marketing company specializing in licensing. "It's like letting the family money get out of the family. It takes a certain level of adjustment."

Selecting the right licensee to entrust with a corporate name should not be taken lightly. A corporation that is hooking up with a blue jean manufacturer, for example, wants to make certain that the company has a substantial share of the market in that particular category, Ms. Bailey says.

It might not be a good idea to go to the leading manufacturer, Mr. Konkle says. "How important is the product to the corporation? You often are not going to find the best deal with the largest manufacturer because they are not as motivated."

The licenser should look at a potential licensee as a business partner, he says, not simply as a licensee. Licensers should assess the licensee's stature in the industry, management depth, reputation for product quality and innovativeness, marketing capabilities and distribution, advertising and promotional aggressiveness, past experience in licensing and financial situation, Mr. Konkle says.

It's crucial for licensees to have the resources to fully commit to the new product's development, sales and distribution. "You want a licensee who will go that extra measure to make sure the product is placed at the retail level," Ms. Bailey says.

A corporation needs to have a relationship with a licensee that is prepared to use the license to the fullest extent, Mr. Sisson says. "For that reason, your marketing goals should be parallel."

shoes, jewelry and cosmetics, for example, can be put together so the products can be cross-promoted in ads and at point of sale.

Consultants warn corporations to stay away from licensees in overcrowded categories. "You can find out what categories to avoid by talking to manufacturers and retailers. Do your legwork," Mr. Anson says. "Talk to retailers about where there might be openings for new products or ask them about voids in particular market [segments] and at what price points."

Prospective licensees should do a little investigating of their own, primarily to guarantee they are dealing with the legal property owner. "There have been cases where people have been involved with companies that said they owned the trademark but really didn't," Mr. Konkle says.

Manufacturers also should assess the strength of the property and the licenser's commitment to it, he says. "Find out if they have a support program, involving such things as cross-promotions among their licensees, and check that they are involved in aggressive policing of the trademark, which is always the responsibility of the licenser."

Even a high-quality licensee producing an appropriate product for a very involved licenser may not make it. "It's impossible to predict," Mr. Sisson says. "You've got a great product, at the right price point; the quality is super and the marketing plans work. But the consumers reject it and say, 'We don't need that.'

"There are no guarantees in this business," he says.

FLOVRISHING ROMAN AD BIZ FOVND

By RAYMOND SERAFIN

John Rokicki didn't set out to determine whether toga-clad men who never went to B-school really invented positioning. Nor did he anticipate solving the question "Who came first, the writer or the art director?"

Mr. Rokicki, now a copywriter at Doyle Dane Bernbach's Troy, Mich., office, was merely trying to come up with a master's thesis for a degree from Fairfield (Conn.) University's Graduate School of Corporate and Political Communication. His four years of Latin study at New ark (O.) High School and his interest in advertising led him to pursue the idea that advertising existed during the Roman Empire.

And his research led Mr. Rokicki to conclude that "advertising people, 20 centuries before the King of Beers was crowned, could write headlines, market imports, do brand extensions and place media."

He was surprised that he seemed to be breaking new ground. "There have been a lot of books that talked about the writings found on the walls of Pompeii, but they mostly concentrated on the graffiti, the 'Pseudolus loves Januarius' stuff," says Mr. Rokicki. Some 15,000 inscriptions have been found on the walls of the excavated cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum, which were buried by the lava of Mount Vesuvius in 79 A.D.

Mr. Rokicki pored through t[illegible]s of those writings and found evidence that wine marketing [illegible] time paralleled modern beer marketing. There were at least [illegible]0 wines, most of them branded, with price differentiations, point-of-purchase promotions and endorsements by poets such as Horace ("What would I rather do on the festival of Neptune? Come on, Lydia, hurry and bring forth the stored Caecubian.")

One product of the vine was classified as "frenzy wine." "Without ever having read [Al] Ries and [Jack] Trout, or sitting down with 600

Cigaret ad hearings spark July fireworks

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—Spurred by a new House bill to ban all tobacco promotions, Rep. Henry Waxman moved ahead last week with plans for what could be the most severe examination of tobacco marketing since the congressional debate that resulted in cigaret ads being banned from broadcast media in 1971.

Rep. Waxman (D., Cal.), one of Capitol Hill's most outspoken tobacco opponents, set July 21 as the tentative start of tobacco advertising hearings before his health and environment subcommittee.

Potentially at stake is the approximately $2.8 billion spent by tobacco marketers each year on various forms of advertising and promotion.

Earlier this year, Rep. Waxman convinced Congress to force smokeless-tobacco ads from tv and radio and to require health warnings on all product labels and print ads. The setting of a tentative date for his tobacco-marketing hearings followed the introduction of a bill by Rep. Michael Synar (D., Okla.) to ban all tobacco promotions (AA, June 9), and the Defense Department's decision, also last week, to severely restrict tobacco use in the military.

American Medical Assn. eyes alcohol advertising—Page 90.

The subcommittee hearings on tobacco marketing could be significantly different from last year's congressional examination of beer and wine advertising, which ended with a rejection of suggestions that Congress impose new restrictions on marketers of those products.

Unlike the initial beer and wine hearings last year, the Waxman hearings take place against a back-

'Cosby' leads network revenue parade

Thursday payday at NBC

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—What a difference a megahit makes.

Riding on the unrivaled success of "The Cosby Show," the NBC-TV Thursday-night prime time lineup has pulled in an estimated $401.4 million through the first three quarters of the 1985-86 broadcast year. And that's about $118.2 million, or 41.7%, more than the night delivered to the NBC network coffers for the same period the year before.

Those came despite "Hill Street Blues'" lukewarm pricing performance. "Hill Street" so far is running $2.6 million, or 2.4%, behind a year ago.

"Cosby" alone has brought in some $92.9 million in three quarters, up 102.8%, or $47.1 million, from 1984-85.

The program revenues are based on Broadcast Advertiser Reports and A.C. Nielsen Co. data obtained by ADVERTISING AGE. The data track average prices paid for 30-second units in all network shows and have been projected here on the basis of 10 network minutes per hour and a 12-week quarter. While BAR and Nielsen say the monthly reports cannot be used to project precisely what network revenues would be for an entire quarter, the actual figures would not be significantly different.

These dollar figures do not account for several factors that would result in less real revenues for the networks, including make-goods, stunting, bonus spots and pricing variations on multi-daypart deals. However, by applying the same criteria to each program, the projections provide the maximum revenue potential of a show and demonstrate the relative pricing strength of the show.

The data demonstrate just how strong NBC's market position is going into the 1986-87 prime time upfront market. Besides the huge increases for its Thurs-

The basic sticking point, according to one insider, was that "Saatchi just doesn't want to do it [advertising] the McDonald's way and McDonald's doesn't do anything

HIGHLIGHTS

Tobacco marketing gets scrutiny 1
Spurred by a new House bill to ban all tobacco promotions, Rep. Henry Waxman moved ahead last week with plans for what could be the most severe examination of tobacco marketing since cigaret ads were banned from broadcast media.

B.C. wasn't B.A. 1
John Rokicki didn't set out to determine whether toga-clad men really invented positioning. But research led him to conclude that during the days of the Roman Empire "advertising people, 20 centuries before the King of Beers was crowned, could write headlines, market imports, do brand extensions and place media."

Execs still wary of conflict 3
Comments by leading executives among both advertisers and agencies indicate a strong conviction still exists that conflict-free proprietary relationships remain a basic of today's advertising business. Conflict was the subject of the latest Advertising Age Sounding Board Poll.

The name game 6
Its code name was "4108." But the word "Omni" was something the principals in the "big bang" merger of BBDO International, Doyle Dane Bernbach and Needham Harper Worldwide liked early on. So after numerous permutations of that word were explored, Omnicom Group emerged as the official name of the new holding company.

Murjani loves Tommy 35
When Murjani International sprung an ad campaign last fall, pushing Tommy Hilfiger as a top new designer, much of Seventh Avenue laughed. Now, it's Murjani's turn. In a sample of 800 people in six markets, Murjani found 82% of the target audience intended to purchase or would consider purchasing Mr. Hilfiger's clothes.

Kiam's somebody 36
Victor Kiam, president-ceo, Remington Products, is backing a new line of Remington leisure wear now selling at Sears, Roebuck & Co. stores. Just as Mr. Kiam patriotically touts his electric shavers as made in the U.S., he is touting the clothes as the U.S. textile industry's answer to foreign competition.

Rating agencies' work 76
Top agencies concede they do their best work for only 56% of their clients and top advertisers rate the quality of the work they get as a 7.5 on a 10-point scale, according to a survey released by Nancy L. Salz Consulting.

Beef marketers lighten up 89

Wahl turns stubble 'play' 91
The stubble-face look, a trend made popular by king-of-the-5-o'clock-shadow Don Johnson, is sprouting sales for a new shaver that maintains the unruly growth. The Wahl Stubble Device is being billed by Wahl Clipper Corp. as the nation's first stubble-keeper.

FEATURES

'Cosby Show' duo 38
Three years ago, comedian Bill Cosby called his longtime agent and said he wanted to make another tv show. His terms, however, were not simple. He wanted a firm series commitment from a network without filming a pilot episode. And he wanted to tape the show on the East Coast. At that time, not even Bill Cosby had the clout to make that kind of deal. Enter Marcy Carsey and Tom Werner.

Sock it to 'em, Cynthia 56
Cynthia McKinney has ducked headhunters, weathered the Philippines coup, conquered anorexia and created her own company. She brings her poodle to the office and a smile to her work. She's 27. She designs socks.

INTERNATIONAL

Mac weighs pan-European tv 58
McDonald's Corp. is reassessing how big a commitment to make to pan-European tv, just as the regional channels are altering their strategies to stem the flow of red ink. The fast-food marketer is considering all its options—including reducing what it spends on pan-European tv—before entering its third year on Rupert Murdoch's Sky Channel, the pioneering and biggest pan-European station.

Heinz targets Third World 59
H.J. Heinz Co. is starting a major push into Third World and other markets where the company is not yet a factor. The strategy is to use a new fruit drink called Frutsi to enter these markets and, once there, find other niches Heinz can exploit. Heinz may also choose a global agency for the product.

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—The $50 million takeover of the HBM/Creamer advertising and pr group is only the beginning of U.K. agency Wight Collins Rutherford Scott's plans for the U.S.

Like Saatchi & Saatchi when it entered the U.S. market several years ago, WCRS is eager to expand both internationally in advertising and into related business services in Britain and later the U.S.

At a press conference in London Wednesday, June 11, to announce a conditional agreement to buy the U.S. agency (AA, June 9), WCRS chief executive Peter Scott said privately held HBM/Creamer will be paid $42.2 million on completion of the deal. The balance will be ay schedule, NBC also has shown uge gains for "Highway to leaven" (bringing in 48.6%, or 27.6 million, more than the same eriod a year ago) and "Miami ice" (up 80.7%, or $74.8 million, hrough the first three quarters). Almost all NBC's returning series howed substantial price increases n April, compared with year-ago nd March, 1986, rates.

As a result, almost all of NBC's eturning shows are entering the pfront season with pricing moentum, giving the network a tremendous advantage over ABC and, o a lesser degree, CBS.

In addition, agency network neotiators have projected that NBC vill have at least three new hit hows this fall—"Amen" starring herman (George Jefferson) lelmsley, "L.A. Law" from "Hill treet Blues" creator Steven ochco, and "Matlock," the new ehicle for Andy Griffith (see hart below). The admen also predict that CBS will have three new vinners ("Designing Women," Kate O'Brien, Surgeon" and Taking the Town") while ABC hould have one certified hit ("Our Kind of Town") and two possible uccesses ("Perfect Strangers" and Head of the Class").

According to those agency share projections, ABC will win Monday night with a 27.3 share average, beating CBS by 0.8 shares; a decisive 7.2 share win on Tuesday and a 1.5 share victory over NBC on Wednesday. The rest of the week ABC will come in third, except Sunday when it should finish 0.4 shares ahead of NBC. CBS will win Friday by 1.4 shares over NBC and will continue to dominate Sunday by 8.7 shares. NBC is expected to take Thursday by 10.0 shares and Saturday by 7.0 shares.

A share is the per cent of homes watching tv tuned to a particular show. A rating is the per cent of total tv households, whether turned on or not, watching a show.

Not all of the news is good for NBC. "The A-Team" has been in a serious revenue decline all season, bringing in $22.9 million, or 21.9%, less than the same period a year ago. "Facts of Life" also is running 8.2%, or $3 million, behind 1984-85.

CBS has had five returning shows demonstrate significant revenue gains so far this season. "Murder, She Wrote" is up $22.2 million, or 32.2%, compared with a year ago, while "Newhart," bolstered by a 56.6% increase in April compared with a year ago, has brought in $12.2 million, or 32.6%, more through three quarters. "Dallas" is up $7.2 million, or 6.3%, for the year; "Kate & Allie" is ahead $5.2 million, or 12.1%, despite a weak start, and "Cagney & Lacey" has brought in some $1.4 million, or 2%, more, although it had been ahead almost $6 million before April when its prices dropped 18.3% compared with last year.

Still, the power of "Cosby" and the Thursday-night landslide on NBC has cost CBS plenty. CBS' "Magnum, P.I." is off a hefty $23.3 million, or 25%, from a year ago, and "Simon & Simon" is down $14.9 million, or 13.5%. In the first three quarters of 1984-85, those two shows had estimated revenues of $203.1 million; this year they have delivered only $164.9 million.

CBS' "Falcon Crest" also is running behind 1984-85 by $8.7 million, or 9.4%, even though the show was ahead $1.3 million through the first 12 weeks of the season.

"60 Minutes," the crown jewel of CBS' schedule and the longest running prime time tv series, also has lost some luster recently. Once the highest priced CBS show, "60 Minutes" has seen its price tag erode during the last 18 months. A 30-second spot on "60 Minutes" in April cost an average of $180,000, compared with $183,000 a year ago. For the first three quarters, "60 Minutes" is down $6.4 million, or 3.8%, although the news show still has brought CBS $160.9 million this year.

ABC's two biggest price winners have been "Who's the Boss?" up $5 million, or 14.6%, and "Dynasty," ahead $5.8 million, or 4.3%. However, "Hotel" is off $13.3 million, or 13.4%, and "Webster" is down $7.4 million, or 20.4%. All four shows have been renewed for 1986-87.

The shifting fortunes of the three networks in part is a reflection of softening network economy. Last year net tv ad expenditures declined for the first time since 1971. But they also reflect a new hierarchy. While advertisers do not always "buy shows," they do purchase demographics, and NBC's commanding strength in prime time household ratings, as well as in key demographic categories, explains its substantial unit cost gains during the last year.

Each network is under pressure to maintain its cost base in key returning shows as they approach this year's upfront selling season. ABC is especially hard-pressed to reverse a yearlong slide in network revenues. As the price increases for "Cosby" demonstrate, even if ABC's new shows fare well, the ad prices won't reflect that success for at least another year.

Already Capital Cities/ABC senior management has predicted a loss for the network this year. CBS, which improved network revenues only slightly last year, is attempting to aggressively build its share of the softening marketplace. Only NBC among the Big 3 appears to have established significant momentum as the 1986-87 prime time upfront selling season approaches, the BAR/Nielsen figures reveal.

BAR collects the unit-cost information from the networks and agencies. This information then is sold to Nielsen, which publishes the costs twice each quarter in a booklet, the NTI/NAC Cost Supplement. The revenue projections here were based on Cost Supplements from October, 1984, to April, 1986, the most recent booklet.

Share projections, 1986-87 season

A survey of network negotiators at a dozen of the top agencies reveals the following audience share projections for the 1986-87 network prime time season. The figures are averages of all responses, although agency share projections never varied by more than two share points and in most cases were identical. The Big 3 tv networks declined to reveal their own share projections, although the agency sources said that by and large the networks expect each show to perform one to three share points better than the agency numbers. *Eastern Times. NBC to keep limits on stand-alone 15s

By WAYNE WALLEY

KAANAPALI, HAWAII—NBC will mit the use of stand-alone 15-secnd commercials and will not uarantee exclusivity, network resident Pier Mapes revealed ere last week.

Mr. Mapes, here for the NBC affiliates meeting, said the network ill allow two 15s in each 60, 90 or 20-second ad block, but spots for ompeting advertisers could be laced side by side. "We will protect all our 30s and we will do our est to protect 15s, but we cannot guarantee it," he said.

Some observers at the meeting said this might discourage agencies and advertisers from using the shortened commercials on NBC, especially since CBS and ABC have embraced the new ad unit.

Even tv syndicators selling barter time have joined the 15-second bandwagon. Last week, San Francisco-based Golden Gater Productions said it will take 15s at 70% of the cost of a 30-second spot, and would reduce the cost to 60% if the agency or advertiser finds another

Chasing buyer loyalty with nameplate distinctions

What's in a nameplate? Plenty, according to the U.S. automotive industry, which is using an increasing share of its marketing to separate and advertise its divisions and brand names.

Entering the 1980s, domestic auto marketers were challenged to shore up profitability in the face of imports' growing market share, which has nearly doubled in the past decade—from 14.9% in 1976 to 27.7% in 1985, according to Automotive News. Although recognizing the need to broaden their offerings, auto marketers were short of capital to accomplish it.

The result was cookie-cutter cars. With Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge Omnis and Plymouth Horizons rolling off the same production line, sometimes even the assemblers couldn't tell the difference. They would tag a car Plymouth on the rear, Dodge on the front.

Customer dissatisfaction with the lack of divisional distinctions began to surface as a problem not only for Chrysler, but also for Ford Motor Co. and General Motors.

Ford's Lincoln-Mercury division played on the similarity between GM's large cars in a fall 1985 commercial, via Young & Rubicam, Detroit, that showed a valet unable to tell the difference among a Buick, an Oldsmobile and a Cadillac. GM officials were piqued, not because the view wasn't valid but because similar examples exist between Ford's two divisions.

Nameplate distinctions will continue to be the focus of the auto companies' marketing strategies. Corporate names are deemphasized or even considered a liability, particularly in bringing foreign models into the U.S. through joint ventures with overseas auto makers.

Divisions are being restructured and refocused to reach that elusive goal: Buyer loyalty.

It had better happen soon. Gerald Greenwald, chairman of Chrysler Motors, the automotive operations group of Chrysler Corp., says excess production capacity is creating a fierce marketing environment. "Somebody's blood is going to spill on the floor this year," he says.

Performance image incites Dodge revolution

By Raymond Serafin

Buying a new car is akin to joining a club, says John Damoose, general marketing manager for Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge division.

"The way the market is going, it's clear that brands—the maker's mark, if you will—are becoming more and more important. People are buying not just a product, they're buying a company. They're buying a brand, buying into a club," Mr. Damoose says.

Establishing a distinct brand identity for Dodge means distinguishing itself not only from its acknowledged competition but also from its sister division, Chrysler-Plymouth. In contrast to Plymouth's reliable, basic transportation image and Chrysler's more luxurious, older target market, Mr. Damoose says Dodge is positioning itself as "the kind of club that's youthful, fun to drive, feisty, performance-oriented and affordable. It's more heavily skewed to males than what Plymouth might evolve as, or what Chrysler is."

In advertising, via BBDO, Southfield, Mich., the new Dodge image entails a heavy use of music and fantasy aimed at the sort of men who form emotional bonds with their cars.

William Kelly, exec vp-general manager for BBDO in Southfield, says research shows Dodge's image already is sharply different from Chrysler's among consumers.

"It's a more gradual process of becoming distinct from Plymouth, but we're moving in the right direction. We're working harder than ever to make those brand images a higher priority," Mr. Kelly says.

Highland Park, Mich.-based Chrysler Corp. couldn't have set up such distinctions five years ago, when its survival was questionable and one division's products looked and drove a lot like the other's.

At that time, Chrysler probably couldn't have afforded to use its marketing to stress nameplate distinctions, anyway. Ads reminded consumers that the company was still in business.

But as it started to make money again, Chrysler, like the other domestic auto marketers, began to produce cars designed to fill specific niches.

The watershed for Dodge was the 1984 model year, when it added the sporty Daytona, the minivan Caravan and the Shelby Charger. To highlight the changes, Dodge introduced the still-running "An American revolution" tag line in a series of avant-garde science fantasy commercials.

In one, a leather-jacketed man wends his way through an eerie cityscape in which an outdoor board of a Dodge Daytona Turbo Z springs to life. Another spot showed a 600 ES Turbo convertible crawling up the side of a building, with "The dream is waiting" the only spoken words.

Although the "American revolution" theme echoes a late 1960s tag line, "Join the Dodge rebellion," Mr. Damoose says the new theme reflects a different standard of performance within the auto industry.

"In the late '60s, you had the muscle cars, with big engines and lots of street speed. Today, performance means something more balanced. It means handling, speed, acceleration and braking," he says.

But in targeting young male drivers, Dodge hasn't ignored the traditional performance criteria.

Dodge victories on the International Motor Sports Assn. sports car and off-road racing circuits have been trumpeted in ads during the past three years.

The current economic and demographic environment enhances a performance positioning, BBDO's Mr. Kelly says. "People are looking for a little pizazz in their life, and it helps that the economy is strong and gas prices are down."

If youthful buyers are what Dodge is driving at, the company seems to be on target. For each of the past four years, the average age of a Dodge buyer has been lowered by one year and now stands at 39. It would be even younger except for relatively older and less affluent demographics on the division's best seller, the Aries K-car. Chrysler buyers are in the low 40s, while Plymouth customers are slightly younger than Dodge's customers.

Key to the age drop is the $9,000 Daytona, which "exemplifies the new Dodge image more than any other single car," Mr. Damoose says. Company research says the average Daytona buyer is 29 years old with a $30,000 income. Some 36% to 40% are college graduates, and 59% are male, the majority of them single.

"Relative to that highly competitive sports specialty market, the Daytona is different from the [Chevrolet] Camaros and the Mustangs," Mr. Damoose says. In it is embodied "the difference we're trying to communicate with Dodge: Here's a fuel-efficient, front-wheel-drive, high-tech, state-of-the-art, turbo-charged vehicle that nobody else offers."

If the Daytona exemplifies the new Dodge performance standard, its current tv spot, "Expressway to your heart," is the ad that comes closest to defining the new Dodge image, according to Mr. Damoose.

The commercial opens with a young man entering the abandoned Expressway Diner, a solitary building set in a southwestern desert. As he wipes some dust away from the jukebox, it begins to play the rock song "Expressway to Your Heart."

The music transports him into a Daytona that charges through the desert. The image of an attractive woman appears and disappears like a mirage—on the side of the road, on an outdoor board and in the seat next to him, where she fades as she leans close. In the final scene, the young man runs from the diner to a Daytona parked outside, where the woman—now in the driver's seat—closes the window and speeds away.

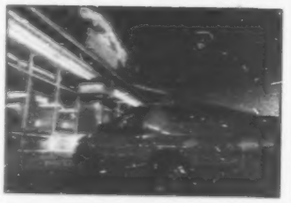
Dodge has been running the 1986 spot on network and cable tv programs skewed to young male viewers and also in movie theaters. Over-all, however, Dodge is using relatively less tv as it tries to reach its new target.

"College students and other young people are way under the national average in receiving effective commercial messages via tv," Mr. Damoose says. "They're much more print-oriented, so we do a lot of print and direct mail."

Dodge began moving more of its media spending into magazines, including the newsweeklies, general interest and sports magazines, and away from tv in 1984. Dodge spent $40.1 million in magazines in 1985, about 30% of its $146.8 million total spending, including dealer association spending, measured by Leading National Advertisers.

Most of Dodge's 47 regional dealer associations have been tying in to the new divisional image through the "Dodge Boys have more fun" theme developed by BBDO, which handles most of the dealer groups.

The differentiation of Dodge products will be enhanced this fall when Chrysler Corp. drops the Chrysler Laser, which is built on the same platform as the Daytona, in a move to give Dodge product exclusivity. The Daytona will receive a major update, while the Chrysler nameplate will feature exclusively the new J-body LeBaron GTC.



Daytona's "Expressway to your heart" spot epitomizes the new Dodge image, according to a company executive.

Both of Chrysler Corp.'s marketing divisions will get versions of the new upscale compact P-car, to be known as Dodge Shadow and Plymouth Sundance, as well as stretched versions of the Dodge Caravan/Plymouth Voyager minivans.

Mr. Damoose says Dodge will offer three "distinctly different" versions of the Shadow, including the ES performance package that will be exclusive to Dodge and marketed to the single male enthusiast driver. The four-door version will be marketed as a versatile family car, while the two-door model will be skewed toward female first-time buyers. Anticipated base retail price is about $8,000. A prelaunch ad campaign for Shadow will begin in mid-August, with the car set to debut Sept. 4.

Also new for 1987 will be the Dodge Dakota midsize pickup truck, for which advertising will break in mid-September. With an anticipated price of about $7,000, the truck will be positioned between large pickups favored by traditional truck drivers and the compact pickups competing for entry-level male buyers' attention.

With Dakota, "We think we're creating a brand new segment," Chrysler Corp. chairman Lee Iacocca said at the recent dedication of the $500 million revamped Dodge truck assembly facility in Warren, Mich.

Including the Caravan minivan, Dodge actually sells more trucks than cars—499,896 trucks vs. 488,788 cars during 1985—and Mr. Damoose says that on a per-vehicle basis, trucks get equal ad support.

Two commercials for Dodge pickups reinforce the division's performance image with a slightly different twist. The soft sell of the first one opens with a shot of a small boy asleep on his father's shoulders. A shot of the boy playing with a toy truck fades into a scene in which he has grown into a man driving a Dodge pickup. Country musicians sing, "Behind the wheel of a dream, and I'm a little boy again."

In the second spot, a Dodge pickup falls from the sky to emphasize its ruggedness, but Chevrolet and Ford trucks "fall short" on warranty protection and are left dangling in mid-air.

Mr. Damoose hopes truck sales will help Dodge achieve its over-all goal: To become No. 3 in total divisional car and truck sales by 1990. Dodge is currently fourth, behind Chevrolet, Ford and Oldsmobile.

"We'll be bringing out a new vehicle every six months for four years, and many of them will be exclusive to Dodge. We're going to be setting new standards for performance," he says, adding, "You may see that line" in 1987 advertising. AA

Buick would really rather have a younger buyer

By Julie Candler

It's easy to picture Sir John Gielgud behind the wheel of a LeSabre. But wouldn't Don Johnson really rather have a Buick, too?

General Motors hopes the answer is yes. Its mandate to Buick, the third largest GM division, is to expand the traditional Buick audience, keeping the affluent demographics but lowering the average buyer's age.

But to hang onto its No. 4 spot in over-all car sales among domestic auto marketing divisions, Buick needs to continue satisfying the loyal owners of its big luxury Electras and LeSabres. The division and its agency, McCann-Erickson, Detroit, are using contemporary ads and new technologies to maintain this split personality.

In its eight nameplates, Flint, Mich.-based Buick has something for everyone who seeks luxury extras and a prestigious name. Its products range from sporty subcompact Skyhawks to big luxury Electras, with base prices ranging from $7,800 for a two-door Skyhawk to $21,577 for a Riviera. Its best-selling Century was the seventh most popular car among U.S. buyers last year, according to Automotive News and the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Assn.

Temporarily, however, there's trouble in Buick City, the radically modernized plant in Flint. Startup problems last fall slowed availability and sales of the new 1986 LeSabre, full-size twin of the Oldsmobile 88. Buick sales also suffered from GM's decision to drop its X cars; the X Skylark accounted for about 10% of Buick's annual vehicle sales. The new N-car Skylark and Somerset, built on the platform of Olds Calais and Pontiac Grand Am, have failed to take up the slack thus far. Rivieras also were in short supply at dealerships.

Julie Candler is a Detroit-based free-lance writer who has contributed to past Automotive Marketing Special Reports.

These problems hurt Buick's 1985 yearend statistics. Olds, third place in market share among U.S. auto manufacturing divisions at 9.65%, pulled farther ahead of fourth-place Buick in 1985, with a slight gain in sales to a total of just more than 1 million. Buick's sales of 845,579, down nearly 100,000 from 1984, represented a 7.66% share of 1985 U.S. car sales. Buick accounted for 18.4% of GM's total U.S. vehicle sales. Over-all, GM chalked up $89.1 billion in 1985 U.S. sales, up 28% from 1984, partly on the strength of record sales by the Oldsmobile division.

Buick and all other GM divisions have a mandate to change. It began in 1984, when GM reorganized its divisions into two groups: One handling Chevrolet, Pontiac and Canadian operations, the other working on Buick, Oldsmobile and Cadillac. Each nameplate division's role is marketing and sales-oriented; responsibility for manufacturing rests with the two larger groups.

Like Chrysler Corp. and Ford Motor Co., the reorganized corporation seeks greater product differentiation. Top brass see Buick currently competing in the same demographic marketplace as Oldsmobile. "The bad news," said Donald Hackworth, Buick's general manager in an interview this year with Automotive News, a sister publication of Advertising Age, "is our products look alike, feel alike and drive alike."

Variation among divisions will come chiefly from the design studios, Mr. Hackworth says. One of the first new Buick image-builders will be a 1987½ luxury sports two-seater, Reatta. The car, with an anticipated price tag of $25,000, will be powered by a sophisticated new Buick 3600 V-6 engine.

The Reatta exemplifies the sporty, performance-oriented younger niche Mr. Hackworth wants to carve for Buick, and he predicts the new models, along with targeted marketing, will help lower Buick's median buyer age of 50.

So that its new image won't escape attention, much of Buick's marketing is centering on performance sports activities and its technological strength in powertrains, particularly V-6 engines.

The new breed of Buick is roaring around the tracks and capturing championships in International Motor Sport Assn.'s Kelly American Challenge Series and International Hot Rod Assn. events. Four LeSabre coupes are vying in the National Assn. of Stock Car Auto Racing's 1986 Winston Cup series. Three March-Buick cars entered the 1986 Indianapolis 500, finishing 24th, 29th and 30th.

"We encourage dealer organizations to capitalize on the success we are having on the race track," says Tony Roman, Buick director-merchandising. "There is considerably more awareness of what our cars are doing."

He cites the successful visit of a van with engine displays and motor sports hardware at a Grand Rapids, Mich., dealership. With it came Scott Brayton, driver of 1986 Indianapolis 500 car No. 27. Powered by a turbo-charged Buick V-6 modified by the car builder, the car last year at Indianapolis set the single-lap speed record.

On the wall of Mr. Roman's big office is a huge framed poster prepared for dealerships. Headlined "Somerset a record," it pictures three speedy Buick Somersets and describes their 1985 championships.

In addition to the racing programs, Buick tv spots are targeting baby boomers. A typical 1986 Skylark spot shows a young family exercising to stay in shape, rushing to work, putting the baby in the car and stopping at a playground.

Mr. Roman says the hawk soaring into most Buick ads also has a youthful, yet universal, message that Buick is "dedicated to the free spirit in just about everyone."

Buick division spent $45 million in measured media spending in 1985, according to Leading National Advertisers. About two-thirds of that was spent on network and spot tv.

But even as Buick targets the baby boomers as a younger demographic, Mr. Roman points out that the group fast is approaching 40, and "Buick has products to appeal to them as they get older," he says.

Marketing strategies for 1987 will be shared with dealers in August. Mr. Roman says the company will call for active retailer participation in the regional marketing operations begun in October, when Buick consolidated all media buying at McCann-Erickson's Detroit office.

The agency predicted then that regional marketing would increase in importance to accommodate geographic market opportunities and special market and distribution needs.

"We will probably be more and more involved in [regional marketing]," Mr. Roman says. He points to the differences between dealer organizations and

Help is just a telephone call away

Buick was the first auto marketer to develop telemarketing that puts potential customers and current owners in touch with someone with answers to questions and complaints.

The company's toll-free telephone number, introduced two years ago, was the result of studies that showed cars competing with home entertainment centers and other big-ticket items for consumer dollars. Research also revealed that many consumers dislike visiting showrooms, yet are twice as likely to buy after taking a test drive.

The research showed that while a satisfied customer shares the experience with eight of his friends, a dissatisfied customer broadcasts his problems to 16 people. "We want to take those people who may be dissatisfied with a dealer or product and make it an opportunity to solve problems and make them happy," says Tony Roman, Buick director-merchandising. "From the time we receive a complaint to the time cases are closed is less than 10 days."

Now all print ads end with the message, "For more information, a test drive or a brochure, call: 1-800-86-BUICK." While competitors' 800 numbers are regional or reach an answering service, Buick boasts that its calls reach not only Flint, Mich., headquarters, but also operators who have computer access to thousands of answers about Buick and its competitors.

Last summer, Buick introduced another high-tech marketing approach, its Electronic Product Information Centers. An International Business Machines PC uses EPIC's software to provide consumers with product information. They can punch up competitors' prices, product specifications and other facts—even "build" the car of their choice—and take home a printout. EPIC also gives them the bottom line on monthly payments.

More than 400 dealerships now employ EPIC as a sales tool and 200 more are expected to add the system in the next year. An EPIC is being tried at Detroit's Metropolitan Airport and at the Churchill Downs Museum outside Louisville, Ky.

EPIC was set up early this year in transportable kiosks in Dallas' Irving Mall and Miami's International Mall. Customers are left alone inside the kiosk to test sound systems and use a touch-sensitive screen that features audio-visual product presentations. A telephone links them to customer assistance in Flint.

"We know it works," Mr. Roman says. "We got reports from dealerships of people bringing in EPIC printouts. I think sooner or later every manufacturer will be doing this."

Younger buyers are the goal of Buick's contemporary advertising, such as this for "Myhawk" Skyhawk.

products sold in California and New York. "We have assistant general sales managers who reside in those areas and work actively with dealer organizations for the most targeted marketing possible."

The Somerset and Skylark Sports Editions produced recently for sale only in California have been received warmly. The cars, featuring Shelby aluminum wheels, special tires and handling packages, sport steering wheels and color-coordinated exterior trim, are designed specifically to attract the nontraditional Buick buyer.

"They are bringing to the showrooms a buyer that Buick dealers haven't seen before," Mr. Roman says. The buyers are primarily those who originally intended to buy an imported car, he says.

A special sesquicentennial 1986 LeSabre coupe produced for Texas' 150th anniversary of statehood sports special paint trims and options, with the state's outline branded inside and out. It also was received well, according to Mr. Roman.

Another regional activity is executed through Buick's dealer marketing and advertising groups, which often piggyback locally on Buick's national tv buys such as ABC-TV's "Monday Night Football," network news and the Academy Awards show.

Other specific groups also are being targeted. Last year, Buick and McCann-Erickson's Los Angeles-based subsidiary, La Agencia, conducted the division's first national campaign to reach Hispanics and directed a regional campaign in Florida to them.

But the regional and Hispanic marketing programs are only part of Buick's larger emphasis on a younger buyer. That new approach to youth is summed up by a print ad for the new LeSabre Grand National, with copy emphasizing its performance capabilities. It's headed: "We're looking for a few good drivers."

GM searches for the fountain of youth

What General Motors wants is five good, distinct images for its car divisions, which deal with model lines that sometimes overlap and compete. GM also is searching for a winning concept for its new Saturn. All of the new images must be youthful and performance-oriented to help the nation's largest auto maker recapture the two percentage points of market share lost in 1985, when it dropped to 42%.

The goal of product differentiation was summed up recently by Lloyd Reuss, exec vp of GM's North American Passenger Car Groups. By the 1989 model year, Mr. Reuss promises, "We will have more distinct divisional market segmentation and less overlap."

One way to diversify, he says, is to assign the divisions different body styles of the same car lines. As an example, he points to the J-body cars (Chevrolet Cavalier, Pontiac 2000, Buick Skyhawk, Oldsmobile Firenza and Cadillac Cimarron). Instead of all divisions handling all seven models of the J cars, he suggests, one might handle a sedan, while another might have the exclusive on the wagon.

During the next decade, that type of segmentation will be incorporated into development of GM models that will be sold by several divisions.

"The person who buys a compact station wagon and the buyer of a sport coupe are completely different demographically," says Tony Roman, Buick's director-merchandising. "If we can do well with a sporty model or a wagon, that's where we should be concentrating our efforts, instead of the broad spectrum of models within a segment."

One reason for the segmentation is to reduce the number of GM models. The reductions will help dealers market cars and lessen production costs.

GM also wants to encourage each division to go after outside competition, rather than its sister divisions.

In diagraming the niches each GM division's marketing strategy and new car additions seem to be working toward, Cadillac stretches between conservative and expressive. Buick and Pontiac are perceived as GM's expressive divisions, with Chevrolet and Oldsmobile on the conservative side. Saturn rests, at least temporarily, in a neutral center spot.

Marketing at each division reflects the new images they are seeking.

Chevrolet is taking over GM's challenge to the Japanese small-car competition with three low-price cars: Sprint, Spectrum and Nova. Chevy ads emphasize the large-volume sellers, Cavalier, Celebrity, Caprice and Impala. Reorganized field sales and marketing divide their operations into four geographic areas to meet "unique needs of each part of the country."

GM's top executives hope that 80% of Saturn sales will represent new business to the corporation.

The division was the first at GM to experiment with satellite dealerships at malls in Moline, Ill., and Appleton, Wis. In another move to reach more customers, Chevy is trying computer-based electronic display centers at malls.

Chevrolet emphasizes motor sports and promoted heavily the Corvette pace car at the 1986 Indianapolis 500.

With its first product due in the late 1980s, the Saturn division intends to market a low-price, but not bargain-basement, subcompact positioned between Chevrolet and Pontiac.

"We will start looking for an agency probably in the fall," a Saturn spokesperson says. "We will be definitely going for a young market and competing with the imports."

Saturn will be GM's testing grounds for new marketing techniques. GM's top executives hope that 80% of Saturn sales will represent new business to the corporation.

Pontiac is GM's representative to the lower price sports car market, with the best example of its niche the innovative two-seater Fiero. The division's 1986 strategy included a three-month, $4 million youth marketing campaign. A 1986 California ad blitz was part of a plan begun three years ago with opening of a West Coast marketing office to raise the Pontiac profile there.

Pontiac promotes motor sports heavily and publishes a "Winners Circle" monthly newsletter touting its wins.

Oldsmobile's market niche is upscale, conservative buyers. But a clue to Olds' desire also to look younger is its recent decision to replace celebrity spokesman Dick Van Patten with younger pro golfer Fuzzy Zoeller, who will be featured with his family in 1987 ads. Since 1981, Mr. Van Patten has appeared in ads with his wife and three sons, all in their 30s.

To further enhance its image with younger buyers, Olds plans to market a luxury sport coupe by the 1990 model year. Olds also continues to promote its participation in motor sports.

At the top of the GM price scale, Cadillac is fighting to keep its upscale reputation and be the luxury car leader in the face of strong competition from European imports.

A new ultra-luxury coupe/convertible, Allante, built in partnership with Italy's Pininfarina, will make its debut as a 1987 model. Hopes are that it will enhance Cadillac's image with younger buyers.

To separate Cadillac models from those offered by other GM divisions, an all-new, exclusive DeVille and Fleetwood will arrive for 1989. Present models of both cars will be stretched 2.5 ins. in wheelbase for 1987. Cadillac also is reassuring fans of the big rear-wheel-drive car that its Brougham and Brougham d'Elegance will be around as long as gas is plentiful.

Lincoln-Mercury steers toward brand strategy

By Richard Johnson

When the spotlight fell on the baby boomers in the early 1980s, Ford Motor Co.'s Lincoln-Mercury division found a ready-made demographic bull's-eye. And although almost every marketing unit in the country has courted the young careerists, at Lincoln-Mercury it truly seemed like a match made in heaven.

Richard Johnson covers Ford Motor Co. as a reporter for Automotive News, a Crain Communications Inc. publication.

The division traditionally has been perceived as a buttered-up version of meat and potatoes Ford Motor Co., Detroit, awaiting buyers with a little discretionary income. The objective now is to turn that image into a shiny symbol of upscale automotive value within Ford.

But to build an identity with the baby boomers it covets, L-M must map out a future as something more than a reflection of Ford. This full-scale advertising and marketing mission's grand strategy is brand strategy: Make Mercury mightier, build on Merkur, let Lincoln be Lincoln.

"We're looking at the division not as a whole, but rather looking at our brands," says Edsel Ford, L-M general marketing manager and great grandson of company founder Henry Ford.

The efficiencies of brand management make sense for L-M, which has a smaller ad budget than Ford. Ford executives estimate that Lincoln-Mercury will spend about $135 million on advertising in 1986, up about 10% from last year. Leading National Advertisers reports L-M spent $61.1 million in measured media in 1985. Ford division ad spending, on the other hand, is pegged at about $350 million for 1986, 12% more than 1985.

"From an image standpoint we're continuing to build three separate brand identities," says Chuck Riley, senior vp-group director for the L-M account for Young & Rubicam, Detroit. "The products are very different, the targets are very different and the advertising is very different."

For example, no longer is it "Lynx from Lincoln-Mercury"—it is "Mercury Lynx." Likewise, it's the "Lincoln Town Car."

"The rationale before," Mr. Riley says, "was to elevate Mercury, give it prestige status. It made sense as 'Lynx, the kind of comfort you expect from Lincoln-Mercury.' But it probably didn't do anything for the brand name Mercury. That was a big problem."

The division wants to pass the brand message on to dealers and have them apply the same principles to local advertising.

"People who want a Lincoln don't buy a Lincoln-Mercury. If we had our way, a dealer selling Town Cars would advertise itself as Hempstead Lincoln, not Hempstead Lincoln-Mercury, and when advertising Sable it would be Hempstead Mercury," Mr. Riley says.

Industry analyst Arvid Jouppi, senior vp for Keane Securities Co., Detroit, says while L-M has benefited from Ford Motor Co.'s over-all styling leadership, its products do not yet stand out from Ford's.

"They don't have enough product differentiation," he says. "It becomes a classic case of who can attract the most dealers because the products are pretty much the same. The numbers and effectiveness of the dealer body has been very important."

"I think people in the marketplace probably see Mercury as a jazzed-up Ford," Mr. Ford says. "We are trying to dispel that image and create a new image, and we'll start doing that with some of our future products, creating a unique market niche for ourselves."

By early 1987, six of 11 Lincoln-Mercury entries will be exclusive: The three Lincoln models, two Merkur products and a new subcompact based on the Mazda 323 that will be built in a new assembly plant under construction in Hermosillo, Mexico.

L-M hopes the new exclusives will help its market share, which stood at 6.2% in 1985, down from 6.5% the previous year, when stricter Japanese import restraints were observed. For the first four months of 1986, L-M's slice of domestic business
